Military chaplain enjoys teaching word of God to Fort Bliss congregation

FORT BLISS, Texas (AP) — Maj. James Winn looks dangerous in his camouflage fatigues and black combat boots.

In fact, at 6 feet 4 inches tall and 195 pounds, he looks downright deadly.

But if the Fort Bliss officer is ever sent off to war, he'll be carrying a Bible, not an M-16.

"My only weapon is the word of the Lord," he said. "If it came between me and the enemy, I would have to be killed."

"I would never carry a weapon. First of all, it's too heavy."

That doesn't mean he or other Army chaplains avoid combat—they follow the troops.

Winn, 41, said he knew he might be called to war when he joined the Army 13 years ago as a minister of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

"I had to make a very clear decision that one day we might have to get the bombs and guns and whistles out and I would have to do my part," the Chicago native said. "And I've always known that wherever the soldier goes, I'll go."

"But we all have a mission, the artilleryman, the infantryman, the chaplain. And mine is to preach the word of God. Not only do I believe in the soldiers' right to it."

Winn, who is married and has two children, said the life of an Army chaplain is filled with challenges, many of them unique to the military.

"The chaplain must know that, yes, I'm a child of God, but I'm a soldier, too. We have to keep our boots shined and meet all the physical requirements of other soldiers," Winn said.

He does almost an hour of aerobics every day to keep trim since "the cav (armored cavalry) troopers aren't going to listen to someone whose belly is out to here."

Most of his Army time, including duty in West Germany and Greece, has been spent in the field serving "a troop ministry. I never had a congregation, where I was 'the man.'"

That changed when he came to Fort Bliss last year.

He was appointed to the position of post chaplain staff resource manager—in charge of money, supplies and people—and named pastor of a special congregation.

"At Centurion Chapel, the other side of my dream came true," Winn said. "After 13 years of troop time, I had a congregation."

The congregation is unusual, he said, because it's mostly retirees. About half his congregation has attended the same chapel for a decade, unlike some Army chapels filled with transient soldiers.

Winn's boss, post chaplain Col. Clyde Brown, said Centurion is the largest Protestant service on post, averaging about 500 people.

"I think they're one of the most vital congregations," Brown said. "It includes 15 to 20 denominations, has five choirs, and has a parish council organization of retired and active people."

Brown said Winn personifies the Army wants in a chaplain—those requirements are stringent.

"First, a chaplain must be ordained by his denomination. He must have 120 hours of undergraduate study and 90 hours of graduate study, so he will usually have a master of divinity degree."

Then each chaplain candidate selected by an endorsing committee of his denomination. Next, he is interviewed and recommended by a military post chaplain.

Then his credentials and background information are given to the post chaplain headquarters.

Once in the Army, Brown, the chaplain goes to school for weeks. Then he faces 18 months of evaluation.

"It's about three years before a chaplain duties," Brown said.

"Our chaplains' primary mission is to go where the soldiers are. We try to do our best to help families, but that's not our main focus."

Winn said it's a life he never wants to leave.

"I know I want to be around the rest of my life. It gives your blood after a while," he said. "I guess I love to be around soldiers because I am one."

"It is a service—serving your low man and keeping the peace. I believe God smiles on our people."
