MIDLAND (AP) — A shortage of qualified roughnecks in the oilfield has prevented some Permian Basin drilling companies from operating at capacity. And the shortage will not let up until there is sustained, increased drilling activity.

"I can see it coming," Ray Peterson said of a critical shortage of qualified roughnecks. "I know the Permian Basin, or the United States for that matter, could not sustain much increased activity without experiencing a serious shortage."

Peterson of Peterson Drilling Co., is president of the local chapter of the International Association of Drilling Contractors. His firm has not "turned down work" because of the perceived shortage, but Peterson knows it's inevitable.

"We've (the oil industry) starved them out and they left the area," he said. "And it's hard to attract them back."

Gene Grimes with Grace Drilling noticed a tightening of the supply of roughnecks about one month ago. He said the shortage is not critical yet, but admitted his company could be working one or two more rigs if it could recruit qualified roughnecks.

Cactus Drilling Co., has 22 rigs to operate, but is working only nine now, partially because of the shortage of qualified roughnecks, according to Mac McGee.

"There is a lack of qualified people right now," he said. "There just aren't any roughnecks out there. If they didn't stay in the oil business, they're out of the country."

And the individuals who have remained with the oil business are well servicing, he said.

"It began in 1988, but this is the worst year in history for the drilling industry," he said.

"There is a lack of qualified people right now. There just aren't any roughnecks out there."

— Mac McGee
Cactus Drilling Co.

McGee said drillers tend to start the number of rigs they start up in the fourth quarter. And for that reason, he doesn't want to hire additional crews just for a temporary amount of time.

"You can't hire people just for the fourth quarter and when it goes back to low activity levels expect to have experienced help."
