Rally

"And revolutions rarely lead to democratic solutions. You usually end up with the government of whichever group had the most guns," Kibb said, "and that would most likely be the African National Congress." ANC leadership would be harmful because it is a "terrorist group," Kibb said. He said the ANC leaders support the killing and torture of blacks who support the current regime. It is because of the instabilities of the impoverished communities that divestment would not work, Kibb said. "We are afraid that the country is so economically unstable that it might be torn apart," he said. Free enterprise, rather than divestment, is the answer, Kibb said. "We believe that a good dose of free enterprise would lead to a stronger economy and to the end of apartheid," he said. "We also feel that will have more influence if we are still involved in South African companies." Sharon Shafer, the president of Young Conservatives, said they simply want to encourage alternatives. "We want people to look at this issue from a long-term standpoint," she said. "We do not think divestment is the way to end apartheid." Tang said he thinks apathy is the reason for a lack of involvement on the part of A&M students. "I am frustrated by the people on this campus," he said. "They seem to find excuses not to question themselves or their political party." Tang drew upon the adage that if you are not part of the solution, you are part of the problem. "You may care, but if you do not do anything, it doesn't matter," he said.
