Archaeologists ask government to protect Indian rock art sites

EL PASO (AP) — Two archaeologists have discovered four area sites abundant with well-preserved ancient Indian rock art and are asking federal officials that they be designated as national monuments. Gerald X. Fitzgerald and Alex Apostolides hope the designation will save the art from vandalism and ensure their preservation. Some of the art is located at a Fort Hancock site where the government is considering building a low-level nuclear dump. The petroglyphs, or rock carvings, and pictographs, or rock paintings, are estimated to range from 3,000 to 6,000 years old. The archaeologists found the art in the Alamo Canyon near Fort Hancock, about 50 miles southeast of El Paso; Coronudas Peak near El Paso; Alamo Mountain in southern New Mexico; and in Three Rivers, about 30 miles north of Alamo-gordo, N.M. The four sites are tied together by "The artistic quality... rivals patterns and motifs... that are in national museums." — Kay Sutherland, anthropologist said Apostolides, curator of the El Paso Wilderness Park Museum. Kay Sutherland, an Austin anthropologist who helped discover many of the carvings and paintings at the sites, said they are unique because the art is so well-preserved and not vandalized, unlike rock-art sites in California. The Fort Hancock site contains the largest single concentration of archaic hunting scenes in the United States, and Three Rivers contains hundreds of carvings of masks which are not commonly found, Sutherland said. The masks represent gods, she said. "The artistic quality of the petroglyphs and pictographs rivals patterns and motifs of bowls, blankets and masks that are in national museums," Sutherland said.
