Committee: parole board members should wait

AUSTIN (AP) — The House General Investigating Committee recommended Wednesday that former state parole board members and employees be required to wait a year before taking jobs seeking parole for convicted criminals.
"If a man has just been serving on the board, and the next day he starts representing someone who is in the penitentiary, on the face of it, it looks bad," Rep. Bill Hollowell, committee vice chairman, said.
The House committee, which has been studying the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles for six months, also said the agency needs a "well-publicized and enforceable" policy guaranteeing employees the right to contact legislators, on their own time, without fear of reprisal.
Rep. Doyle Willis, committee chairman, said the recommendations are subject to change when they are included in the final report to the House before lawmakers convene in regular session in 1991. He said he did not expect action on them in the current special session.

Some proposals could be implemented by the agency, Willis, D-Fort Worth, said. Parole board spokesman Karin Armstrong said the agency has clarified its policy to ensure employees feel free to speak to lawmakers and others, as long as they identify statements as opinion.
The probe was prompted by the firing of two Port Arthur parole officers, who claimed they lost their jobs because they discussed problems with lawmakers. The agency denied the allegations.
The committee's investigation also included the so-called parole advocates, parole board employment practices and the agency's handling of parole fees.

Among those who have been hired as advocates by people seeking parole are a former board member and a former commissioner, neither of whom are lawyers, according to testimony to the House committee.
Henry Keene, parole board chairman, has said there is nothing unethical about the practice. He said the former agency members don't get special privileges.
But the committee said a one-year waiting period is appropriate before former agency employees, board members and commissioners take such a consulting job.

"This is a sensitive area," Hollowell, D-Grand Saline, said.
The committee is waiting for attorney general's opinion on whether people who are not lawyers can legally take money to represent people before the parole board.
The House panel delayed action on a number of proposed recommendations, including one prompted by the 1988 sexual abuse of a female parole officer in the Beaumont area.

Abducted child's parents work to change bail laws

AUSTIN (AP) — The parents of a Fort Worth teenager who was abducted and killed said Wednesday that Gov. Bill Clements voiced support for their efforts to change state bail laws.
But Clements said he doesn't know whether he will allow the Legislature to consider such a change during the current special session, Mary Thatcher said.
The parents of Amy Lynn Thatcher presented petitions with 77,000 signatures supporting a proposal to deny bail to parolees suspected in violent crimes.

"He said he was going to do everything in his power," Mrs. Thatcher said after meeting with the governor. "He thought it was going to do some good. We can't bring Amy back, but maybe we can save the lives of other children and the elderly."
"If we can just stop one person from suffering as Amy did, then we will feel this campaign has been a success," added Terry Thatcher.
A proposed constitutional amendment, authored by state Rep. Rick Perry, R-Haskell, also would deny bail to parolees charged with sexual assaults.

Seminar informs citizens about collider benefits

DeSOTO (AP) — A seminar designed to inform citizens how they can cash in on the super collider project attracted more than 600 people.
The 90-minute seminar Tuesday at a hotel in this suburb south of Dallas attracted so many people that a television monitor and chairs were hastily set up outside the ballroom to accommodate those who couldn't get in.
The seminar was sponsored by Best-Southwest, an organization formed by the chambers of commerce in Duncanville, DeSoto, Cedar Hill and Lancaster to promote economic development.

The collider, expected to reveal new information about the nature of matter and the origins of the universe, would hurl minute beams of protons toward one another inside a 53-mile tunnel to be built in Ellis County south of Dallas.
The project is expected to cost almost $6 billion and create 4,000 temporary and 3,000 permanent jobs.
President Bush signed legislation in September that allocated $225 million for the collider — $135 million for the construction and $90 million for research.

Teleconference to focus on AIDS issues

A live interactive teleconference will be presented on "AIDS in the College Community: From Crisis to Management" today at noon in 701 Rudder.
The teleconference will feature panelists representing a variety of AIDS-related interests who will discuss issues, examine cases and formulate solutions for ethical problems and policy decisions that face college administrators.

The National University Teleconference Network and Ohio State University are sponsoring the teleconference in cooperation with several local organizations.
The conference is slated to last until 3 p.m. and will be followed by a question-and-answer session featuring a local panel of experts.

Conference teaches about multicultural issues

"Creating a Multicultural Environment in Residence Life," a one-day regional drive-in conference Friday, will teach staff and student leaders from Texas colleges how to deal with a variety of multicultural issues in residence life.
The conference will deal with a variety of multicultural issues and will teach participants how to work with people of color, Gloria Flores, the coordinator of student development and multicultural programs, said.

The workshop also was designed to bring together residence hall student leaders and residence staff members of the Southwest Region in an attempt to combat racial discrimination, she said.
The conference will last from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Students can register Friday on the second floor of Rudder for $25 which will not include lunch.

Geography department sponsors awareness week

Texas A&M University's Department of Geography will present a speaker, provide a workshop for teachers, and sponsor an awareness program for students in observation of national Geography Awareness Week.
Dr. John R. Giardino, head of geography, said Geography Awareness Week was enacted by Congress three years ago in response to the nation's problem with geographic illiteracy. This year's Geography Awareness Week runs from Nov. 13 to Nov. 18.
Dr. Michael Halford, chief scientist with NASA's Earth Observation Office at the Johnson Space Center, will present "Recognizing the Global Nature of Environmental Problems" in 108 Harrington at 7:00 p.m. Thursday. The speech is open to the public.

"He (Halford) does a rather spectacular program," Giardino said. "It makes you feel like 'boy, we've really messed this planet up, we might as well start looking for a new home.'"
The workshop will be conducted on Saturday from 8:00 a.m. to noon for local elementary, middle, and high school teachers. The workshop will consist of presentations showing teachers how to incorporate more geography into their curriculum, Giardino said.
He said that Bryan-College Station McDonald's restaurants are participating by awarding food prizes to students who correctly identify certain Texas locations on a map.
For information, contact the Geography Department at 845-7141.
