Wolling said. Wolling and DeWoody estimate there are 50 copies of the petition circulating around campus. They said they are unsure of the exact number of copies or the number of signatures they have right now because friends have been making copies of the petition to give to other people to circulate.

When asked about the response they've gotten concerning the petition, DeWoody said it's been pretty "cut and dry."

"People are either for or against it," he said. "There is really no middle of the road. Fifty percent of the people we approach usually sign the petition."

Wolling and DeWoody said that by showing the movie, A&M is contradicting what it stands for.

"A&M frequently promotes awareness of date rapes and other such crimes, and our belief is that pornography of any kind can potentially lead to sex crimes," Wolling said.

DeWoody agreed. "Showing the movie is like adding fuel to the fire," he said.

Parr said Aggie Cinema does not regret showing the movie.

"We chose the film because, based on the fact synopsis we had about the movie, it fit in with the goals of programming (in Aggie Cinema) to bring alternative culture and viewpoints," he said. "It was something you wouldn't normally see by turning on cable TV or renting a video — certainly nothing you'd see in an American cinema."

"We chose the film because ... it fit in with the goals of programming (in Aggie Cinema)."

This movie, along with other Aggie Cinema programs, went through an approval process before being shown to students, he said. A sub-committee within Aggie Cinema researches international movies available by reading reviews and watching for industry comment, Parr said. Then the general committee votes on the movies they feel are best. Decisions are based on plot synopses and countries from which the films come.

The films then go to the Program

Review Committee, an approval committee in the MSC, and also to the MSC Council before a final decision is reached.

Mike Conway, executive vice president of programming in the MSC and chair of the PRC, said the committee took extra measures to ensure this was a quality movie before approving it.

"At PRC, we were concerned so we reviewed the movie which is not typical for us to do. ... We also contacted two French professors and asked them whether they knew anything about the film and what they thought about it," he said.

Although the professors were not familiar with that particular film,

Conway said, they assured the committee that the main actor and director of the movie were prominent in France, and are associated with quality films.

"We gave this film close scrutiny so I don't think anybody (on PRC) has any doubts that we made the right decision to bring the movie," Conway said.

Parr said Aggie Cinema is an open committee and welcomes any students who would like to be part of the movie selection process and have an interest in international cinema.

Aggie Cinema meets every Monday in Rudder Tower. For more information call the Student Program Office at 845-1515.
