Self-stick notes stuck all over

MAPLEWOOD, Minn. (AP) — It was in 1974 that 3M scientist Art Fry, sitting through a boring church sermon, concocted the idea of selfsticking, yellow notes that could be removed without a trace, for use in his choir hymnbooks.

It took him four years to convince his superiors at 3M the idea would sell. Two years later, in April 1980, Post-it notes premiered, and America has been stuck on them since.

"Initial enthusiasm for a piece of note paper with adhesive on the wasn't overwhelming," Fry said. "It was hard to sell the concept that people needed a note pad that would sell at a premium price compared to ordinary scratch paper.'

Now, a decade after the product hit the market, many Americans wonder how they got along without the yellow squares they stick to re- oped countries.

ports, folders, desks, computers, telephones and refrigerators.

3M started with two sizes of Post-it notes: 3 inches by 5 inches and 11/2 by 2, available only in yellow. Today, the company says it has more than 350 varieties, a range of different sizes and colors, plus many with cartoon characters and messages. There are Post-it notes specifically made for taking phone messages, marking book pages and identifying material to be faxed.

Company officials won't release sales figures, but say Post-it notes are one of the nation's top-selling office products, along with tape, copy paper and file folders. They're also big sellers in Japan - where the shape of the notes is long and narrow to accommodate the vertical writing and in Europe and most other devel-
