"Gambler's House" shows a winning hand of quality acting, directing and a unique musical score, and although the characters in the comedy don't win much, the audience can't lose.

The Aggie Players' production is the world premiere of the translation from the Spanish by Golden Age scholar Vern Williamsen.

The original play was written by Antonio Mira de Amescua in 1616, the year Shakespeare died.

Set in Madrid in the 17th century, the play centers on the relationship of Alejandro and Isabel, who have been married for one week at the play's opening.

But Alejandro already is gambling away his wife's dowry, much to the chagrin of his father, Marcelo, played by Jeffery Dench of London's Royal Shakespeare Company.

Understandably popular with his gambling friends, since he always loses, Alejandro is the character around whom most of the comedic action develops.

Determined to break his son of his incessant gambling and womanizing, Marcelo plans elaborate tricks, working in cahoots with Isabel and their servant, Roque.

Meanwhile, Alejandro and his friends, Don Luis and Don Diego, try to win the heart of the beautiful Angela.

At the advice of her greedy mother, Angela manages to lead all three of them on so that Don Luis and Don Diego give her their winnings from Alejandro as gifts to prove their love.

Director Dr. Roberto Pomo of Texas A&M's Department of Speech Communications and Theater Arts, skillfully moves the audience's attention from one group of characters to the next, even with all on stage at once.

The audience's attention moves back and forth between the card game and Angela's flirting with whomever is winning at the moment, keeping the action moving on multiple levels.

By the second act, all the plot development really begins to pay off.

Dench's Shakespearean training is evident in a powerful scene with Mary Ellen Brennen, who plays Angela's mother.

The audience gave that scene spontaneous applause. The hilariously diabolical characterization of Don Luis by John Flores garnered the same response.

In the final act, Alejandro is broken, Angela learns something about greed, and everyone ends up married, although not to whom you may expect.

It is apparent that the play was not meant to be a faithful reproduction of a 17th-century Spanish play.

The program warns of rigorous adherence to an original play, which would end up being interpreted through 20th-century values anyway. The completely synthesized musical score, for example, heightens the feeling of the play's updating, and ultimately makes the play more enjoyable.

Sam Levassar as Carlos and Lanell Pena as Isabel embrace in a scene from "Gambler's House" while Ross Lambert (as Alejandro) looks on. Play continues through Saturday night.

For ticket reservations for the maiming shows tonight, Friday Saturday at 8 p.m. in Rudder Theater, call 845-1234.
