Millions of Hungarians cast ballots, show hope

BUDAPEST, Hungary (AP) — Millions of Hungarians cast ballots Sunday in the first free national elections in 43 years, and many expressed hope for the future and fear of the Communist past.

Premier Miklos Nemeth, a reform-minded Communist and a key engineer of the nation's conversion to democracy, declared moments before he voted that he was relinquishing control "head high and with a clear conscience."

Despite occasional showers, voter turnout appeared brisk at Budapest polling stations, with election officials reporting a turnout of nearly 50 percent in some wards by noon, four hours after the voting began and eight hours before polls closed.

Few irregularities were reported by 8 p.m., when the voting officially ended. Several international observers had monitored the election.

About 7.8 million people were eligible to vote and Janos Nemeth, chairman of the Elections Committee, said preliminary figures showed turnout was more than 70 percent.

Premier Nemeth, who voted at a state-run kindergarten serving as one of 11,000 polling stations across the nation, declined to predict the chances of his Socialist Party, which has governed since reform-oriented Communists formed it after defecting from their party in October.

"The only thing I hope for is that a strong government is created," Nemeth said, adding that only a government not hamstrung by the opposition can deal with the nation's ailing economy.

His comments reflected widespread acceptance, even among Socialists, that his party would not do well despite its role, unique in Eastern Europe, in steering Hungary to democratic reform.

Instead of crediting the Socialists for volunteering to play by democratic rules, most voters remember the excesses of more than four decades of one-party rule have made Communists unpopular throughout the viet bloc.

"I won't consider it an act of God if I don't move into government," Nemeth told reporters. "I will move over the reins head high and with a clear conscience. I don't have bitterness in my heart but satisfaction."

"I will hand over the reins head high and with a clear conscience. I don't have bitterness in my heart but satisfaction."

— Janos Nemeth, premier

The state MTI news agency reported Nemeth lost in Szerencs, a village about 70 miles northeast of Budapest, where he was running as an independent.

With voters able to vote separately for candidates, parties, Nemeth had one of two chances of electing an individual candidate or as a nominee of his party in the Budapest regional slate. If chosen in Szerencs, Nemeth would be struck from the party list.

Throughout the month-long campaign for 394 parliamentary seats, Socialist candidates attempted to convince the electorate of their commitment to a two-party system.

But pre-election opinion polls indicated the Socialists would finish no higher than fourth place, with a minimum 10 percent of the overall vote.

Even new elections, however, were not expected to determine a clear winner, making a coalition government the most likely scenario.

English

they can be mainstreamed as quickly as possible.

Garcia said the ideas Zaeske presented were misleading.

"Let me submit to you that the ideas that Mr. Zaeske promotes are nativist, restrictionist, exclusionary and racist," Garcia said.

Garcia said the history of the settlement of America has been misconstrued by English-only advocates to suggest that English always has been the language of choice. In fact, Garcia said, the founding fathers believed an official language would restrict freedom.

"The melting pot mythology that has been espoused by the English-only advocates is totally false," Garcia said.

Garcia said the diversity of the different people in the country has increased the strength of the country.

Official English would deny minorities their cultural identities, Garcia said, and weaken the nation as a whole.

"Official English teaches our children to be ashamed of their cultures and to forget their past," Garcia said.

Garcia said people like Zaeske should promote English-plus programs and not try to force people to become white American clones. Garcia said many Hispanics are offended when people think minorities are un-American because they speak a different language.

Garcia said Hispanics and other minorities realize English is a very important language and will teach their children English so they can be successful in the American economy.

Garcia said that where the bilingual system is implemented properly, children learn faster and achieve much more quickly.

Garcia said bilingualism is only one way minorities can receive proper education and lead productive lives in the United States.

Official English is only the first step towards discrimination against minorities, Garcia said.

"We need to work together to understand each other," Garcia said. "America is made of many races. Hispanics, Asians, blacks and whites. We all are different and that's what gives America her strength."

The presentation was followed by 20 minutes of questions and statements from the audience.
