ist incorrectly and that it was the South African people who forced him to relax and repeal some laws.

He said the government scrapped the mixed marriage law and immorality law which prohibited sex between two races, even though the government still does not allow members of two races, even married interracial couples, to live together.

Coopage said the people of the country forced the repeal of the law which segregated beaches and the law prohibiting marching in the streets.

De Klerk also released black nationalist Nelson Mandela earlier this year and legalized black political parties such as the ANC.

"It is the people that have forced de Klerk's hand," he said. "It is the people who have forced him to back off the confrontations."

Media

and politics rather than their shortcomings."

Griffin said the media has the greatest influence on those who are not informed enough and enhances what people do know.

"The media just reinforces opinions already formed by the public," Griffin said.

The media uses the same issues again and again, she said. In such a "control-type" situation the media can influence what is important to the attentive public, Griffin said.

"Priming" is the term for changing not only the priorities of the public, but how it evaluates the entire political system, Griffin said.

The panelists agreed that possibly the most important method of determining whether the media or public is dominant is the use of polls and surveys.

But polls and surveys can sometimes be inaccurate and, Shafer said, the American public could possibly be suffering from "fatigue factor," or rather, they're tired of filling out surveys.

Walraven agreed there are underlying circumstances to how surveys and polls are taken.

"I think it's very important to continually question the reliability of surveys and public opinion polls for their validity," Walraven said.

Research by surveys and polls affects the media's aim in that community, Shafer said, and the media must adjust to fit that area.
