Checks

after they have left for the summer.

"We try to find them, but after a few months, the checks are worthless," Sopasakis said. "It's just not worth the time, energy, or the money involved in finding them."

"The extra charge is a much easier solution and the students seem to understand."

The Dixie Chicken also continues to accept checks, but takes them on a selective basis, the owner said.

"It's a judgment call on our part," Don Ganter, Dixie Chicken owner said. "We accept checks from our regular customers and tend to shy away from temporary checks. Most of our business comes from the students and faculty so we tend to cater to them."

Richard Benning, owner of Duddley's Draw, said he has not seen an increase in hot checks toward the end of the semester.

He said Duddley's has had no problem with check writers.

"In fact, we enjoy a lot of additional business because many others on the block are refusing checks," he said. "I think 99 percent of the customers here are honorable and can balance a check book, and since we have no service charge for hot checks, we get paid first when there is a problem."
