Officer hearing abruptly ended by arbitrator

HOUSTON (AP) — An arbitrator assigned to decide whether a former police officer will get his job back abruptly ended a hearing on the matter when the officer's attorney tried to discredit the chief who fired him.

Charles Morris, a Southern Methodist University law professor and a longtime arbitrator, ended the hearing Tuesday, but said he did not expect to make a decision on the case until late November.

Scott Tschirhart, 27, was fired from the department after he killed an off-duty security guard, Byron Gillum, during a routine traffic stop Nov. 15.

Gillum, 24, was shot eight times, including four shots in the back. Gillum was the third black man shot to death by Tschirhart, who is white, in the 7 1/2 years he was a Houston police officer.

Tschirhart was fired in January by then-Police Chief Lee Brown. At least two grand juries declined to indict Tschirhart in the shooting, prompting him to seek reinstatement.

Tschirhart's attorney, Ed Lasof, tried to prove Brown, now New York City's police commissioner, lied during his testimony presented Saturday.

Brown testified he did not know the department's internal affairs division originally did not sustain allegations against Tschirhart. Brown also testified he believed the shooting was unjustified and did not follow the department's regulations on the use of deadly force.

But Morris ordered Lasof not to pursue "a wild goose chase" in presenting witnesses to contradict Brown's claims. Morris said what went into Brown's decision to fire Tschirhart was irrelevant in whether the former officer gets his job back.

Lasof disagreed, saying if that were true, "it was a sham and a farce to have him here in the first place."

Morris ordered Lasof and Assistant City Attorney Luke Daniel to file final written arguments by Oct. 22.

Morris would then rule on the case within 30 days, he said.
