Expert questions TRC drug tests

HOUSTON (AP) — Texas racing officials must take steps to improve drug testing procedures because some drugs used to dope race horses cannot be detected with current laboratory tests, an expert said. "There are drugs out there right now which are being used that we don't have a test for," said Robert Gowen, an animal specialist who administers a drug testing and quality assurance program for the Association of Racing Commissioners International. "These are areas we really need to work on and one of the reasons we need a lot more money." Gowen told the Texas Racing Commission that it needs to spend more than the $27 million it spent last year on drug testing, the Houston Chronicle reported Sunday. Testing laboratories used by various racing states had an overall detection rate of 54.8 percent in blind tests in which they unknowingly received drug-tainted urine and blood samples. But the ARCI is trying to improve that rate. "The whole industry decided that this problem was too big," Gowen said. "The whole industry got together so that the integrity of racing could be protected. We can't have a national market for racing until we have a national program to make sure the integrity of racing is in place." ARCI racing officials from Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and Oklahoma met in San Antonio with Texas racing officials Saturday at a gathering sponsored for the first time by the Texas Racing Commission. The ARCI is comprised of state racing officials from around the nation. The organization began in 1988 to develop a program to clean up and grade testing labs.
