Candidates state positions on AIDS issues

DALLAS (AP) — Texas gubernatorial candidates Ann Richards and Clayton Williams say AIDS should be treated as a public health concern, but they disagree on issues of funding, testing and education.

Responding to questions from The Dallas Morning News, the candidates said they recognize AIDS as an important health issue in Texas, which has the fourth-largest number of reported cases in the United States.

But they differed on other specific AIDS issues:

—Richards, the Democratic nominee, said she would do "everything possible" to expand funding. Williams, the Republican nominee, said he would "maximize" existing state funds spent on AIDS. Neither cited a specific amount of spending.

—Although Richards says that the Legislature has pointed to the instances where there is a "legitimate need for mandatory testing, she believes that "widespread, voluntary testing" is more effective. Williams said mandatory testing "may be appropriate" in certain situations, citing prisoners as an example.

—Richards said discussion about AIDS should begin "at the earliest possible age" and include information about condoms when appropriate for the age group. Williams said AIDS education should begin during the middle school years. He advocates abstinence.

—Both candidates said adequate drug treatment programs are necessary to stop transmission through hypodermic needles. And though neither candidate endorsed distribution of clean syringes, Richards said that distribution of bleach may be the only other acceptable alternative.

Democratic state Sen. Chie Brooks, chairman of the Senate Health and Human Resources Committee, said AIDS is just one of the health issues the next governor will face. But the governor's role and attitudes about AIDS are still crucial, he said.

"It certainly would be helpful, and it would be sorely needed, to see some leadership from the governor's office," said Brooks, D-Pasadena.

"We're seeing the disease change and the public perception finally catching up to reality that AIDS is a danger to heterosexual couples as well as people who are gay."

The Texas AIDS Network and other advocacy groups are expected to lobby next year for an increase in state funding and services.

In 1989, lawmakers approved $18.4 million for AIDS programs that included funds for the anti-drug AZT, payment of insurance premiums for indigent patients and educational services.

Body found in Waller

The body of a man charged with killing state trooper Mark Phebus last week was discovered early Sunday, after he apparently shot himself, law enforcement officials said.

Troopers searching in Waller County at about 7:30 a.m. found the body of Richard Jordan a quarter mile from his abandoned car, Department of Public Safety spokesman David Wells said.

Phebus, 23, a rookie officer, was shot before dawn Sept. 17 in Montgomery County when he stopped at what he believed was a traffic accident but turned out to be a domestic disturbance.

He died in an emergency room that morning.

Jordan was charged with capital murder but remained at large. Authorities discovered Jordan's car on Tuesday in a wooded area. The area was searched on foot and horseback, but no new leads emerged.

Two troopers, Kevin Kenneth of Baytown and Maurice Newbauer of Texas City, resumed the search at daybreak Sunday and found Jordan's body about 11 feet from railroad tracks that run parallel to the road where the car was found, Wells said.

"He was lying on his back and up against his body was a .44-caliber revolver," Wells said.

"It is apparently a suicide," Wells said it was unclear whether Jordan may have killed himself.

"They think it's possible he committed suicide a relatively short time after the Phebus murder," he said.

The troopers were able to identify the body from a waller and clothing.

The body was being taken Sunday to the Harris County Medical Examiner's Office to determine the time and cause of death, Wells said.
