Economy

ple of Taiwan was 15 to 1 in 1992, but is less than 5 to 1 now.

In comparison, the income distribution ratio for the United States is more than 7 to 1.

Exports were only $160 million in 1960, but now total $66.2 billion, which is the 12th largest worldwide.

Li said the drastic economic turnaround is due to a practical government which adopted the right economic policies at the right time and gave the policies time to work.

For example, Taiwan was largely an agricultural economy after World War II, but the government knew it would have to industrialize, Li said.

But instead of making a rapid switch to industry, the government raised agricultural productivity and used surplus money to import machinery and raw materials to begin industrialization.

"(This) enabled Taiwan to avoid heavy foreign debt, food shortage and inflation experienced by many developing countries that had neglected agriculture in their headlong rush to develop industry," he said.

Another key to Taiwan's success is its development of people as resources, Li said.

"At the start of development, human resources was our single key resource," he said. "The nation had little natural resources for economic takeoff and sustained growth."

He said the government has invested heavily in education at all levels, especially at the university and graduate school level.

Li said many of Taiwan's ideas could be used by other developing nations wanting to modernize.

"Certain elements of the Taiwan experience can be transplanted to other countries and take root there, while others remain unique to the Republic of China's economic and natural environment and cultural traditions," he said.
