Extremist rabbi killed by gunman

NEW YORK (AP) — Rabbi Meir Kahane, who campaigned to drive Arabs from Israel and urged American Jews to arm themselves against anti-Semitism, was shot to death Monday night after a speech at a Manhattan hotel.

Police identified the assailant as El Sayyid Al-Nosair, 35, of New Jersey. He was wounded by a postal police officer as they exchanged gunfire outside the Halloran House, police spokesman Officer Scott Bloch said.

The postal officer and a bystander in the hotel also were wounded, police said.

Kahane, 58, a Brooklyn-born Israeli extremist who once served in the Israeli parliament, was pronounced dead at Bellevue Hospital, said hospital spokesman Peter Schectman. Kahane had been shot in the neck, he said.

Mayor David Dinkins said the shooting was "an international tragedy that shocks all of us."

Kahane was head of the anti-Arab Kach party in Israel. The party advocates the ouster of all Arabs from Israeli-held territory and a ban on Jewish-Arab marriages. The movement's symbol is a clenched fist inside a Star of David.

Kahane founded the militant Jewish Defense League in the United States in 1968 to mount armed responses to anti-Semitic acts.

Witnesses said Kahane had given a speech to about 60 people at a meeting of the Zionist Emergency Evacuation Rescue Organization. About 8:05 p.m. (CST), a gunman came into the second-floor conference room and shot Kahane, Bloch said.

The gunman then fled outside and tried to hijack a taxi, Bloch said. An on-duty postal officer in the area interceded. They exchanged gunshots and both were wounded, Bloch said.

The gunman, who was shot in the chin, was believed to be in critical but stable condition at Bellevue. The bystander, shot in the leg, was in stable condition as was the officer who shot in the arm.

Kahane moved to Israel in 1971 and became a citizen a year later.

Kahane served as a member of Israel's Parliament for four years but was barred from running for reelection in 1988 after legislators passed a law banning parties that have a racist platform.

Court ruling says Army must re-enlist gay soldier

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court carved out a one-man exception to the military services' ban on homosexuals Monday, letting stand a ruling that forces the Army to re-enlist a gay soldier.

The justices, without comment, rejected the Bush administration's challenge to the ordered reinstatement of Perry Watkins of Tacoma, Wash., a 16-year veteran with an excellent service record.

Monday's action is not expected to affect in any sweeping way the military's ban on homosexuals. The appeals court ruling in Watkins' case did not address the validity of that ban, but instead noted that the Army repeatedly had re-enlisted Watkins while knowing he is gay.

The case nevertheless had been closely watched by gay rights advocates.

"These days, we'll take a victory any way we can get one," Paul DiDonato of the National Gay Rights Advocates in San Francisco said after acknowledging that Watkins' victory was a narrow one.

But DiDonato said Watkins' case "sends a broader signal out to the military and the country at large that gays and lesbians cannot be treated unfairly forever by the military or any other employer."

Watkins, now 42, said, "My next step is obviously to get reinstated." He said he wants to serve until he can retire with an Army pension in about five years.

When asked if he anticipated problems after his reinstatement, Watkins said, "That goes without saying. The problems that are going to be there are the problems the system itself will create."

"I'm asking for the same rights any other citizen receives."

There was no immediate reaction from the Army or the Department of Defense.

Local gas company official gives advice on safety to heating appliance owners

By KATHERINE COFFEY

Cold weather conjures up images of heavy sweaters, winter coats, hot chocolate and gas heaters.

Bryan-College Station has been hit by a cold front, and cooler weather could be here to stay. Those with gas heaters need to take precautions before turning on the appliances, a gas company official says.

Jerry Collins, Lone Star Gas Co. district manager, says vented and unvented heaters frequently are used by community members.

A space heater, which has no vent or flue gases, is an example of an unvented heater. Carbon monoxide, the combustion product, can be dumped into a room if the unvented heater is not properly adjusted, Collins says.

"If properly adjusted and there is an adequate supply of fresh air coming into the house, then you won't have a problem," he says. "But never leave space heaters burning at night when you go to sleep because it is dangerous.

"If you need to keep the heater on at night, make sure a window is cracked to ensure proper ventilation."

The following are two ways people can get into trouble by using gas heaters:

- Allowing space heaters to become dirty or in a state of disrepair. This leads to poor air quality and could make users ill.
- Using connectors. Collins says, he has seen some people use rubber hoses with space heaters, which definitely can be hazardous. "People should be strongly discouraged from using rubber hoses because if they crack or split they will develop leaks in the house," he says. "People need to remember three precautions, which include always using proper connectors, making sure burners are clean and properly adjusted and also remembering to insure an adequate supply of fresh air."

Vented heaters include wall furnaces, central heating systems and built-in wall and floor vents. He says the same precautions apply to these types of heaters.

Two main things to remember when using a vented heater are to keep the filter clean and to never run the furnace without all its filter panels in place.

"Never leave the filter panel off when the heater is on because flue gases will get into the house," he says.

Flue gases are carbon monoxide, a gas that takes away oxygen and can lead to suffocation. Flue gases can make people sick if too much is inhaled.

"Flue gases can even become deadly if inhaled in high concentrations," Collins says.

Silver Taps ceremony to honor one

The solemn sound of buglers playing "Taps" and the sharp ring of gunfire will be heard on campus tonight as one Texas A&M student who died during the past month is honored in a Silver Taps ceremony at 10:30 in front of the Academic Building.

The deceased student being honored is:

- Gregory Wells Hayward, 23, a senior wildlife and fisheries sciences major from Temple, who died Oct. 5.

Dating back almost a century, the stately tradition of Silver Taps is practiced the first Tuesday of each month from September through April, when necessary. Names of deceased students are posted at the base of the flag pole in front of the Academic Building, and the flag is flown at half-staff the day of the ceremony.

Lights will be extinguished and the campus hushed as Aggies play final tribute to fellow Aggies.

The Ross Volunteer Firing Squad begins the ceremony, marching in slow cadence toward the statue of Lawrence Sullivan Ross.

Shortly after, three volleys are fired in a 21-gun salute and six buglers play a special arrangement of "Taps" three times — to the north, south and west.

Japanese Business Study

United States prompted to improve attitude toward employees, quality, patience

By JAMES M. LOVE
Of The Battalion Staff

Neither the United States nor Japan run businesses perfectly, and they both have many things to learn from each other in business practices, a Japanese-American businessman said Monday.

Masami Atarashi, president of Kokusai Business Brain K.K., a business specializing in consulting and training for Japanese and non-Japanese firms, was a featured speaker for the Japan Business Study.

The Japan Business Study is presenting a four-part lecture series at Texas A&M.

Atarashi outlined some major differences between American and Japanese businesses and the advantages and disadvantages of both.

He stressed that the greatest problems facing the corporate United States are a lack of patience, attitudes toward employees and lower attention to quality.

"The idea of changing a company president every five or six years is absurd," he said. "This could result in sacrificing greater long-term gains for short-term reasons. It takes at least three or four years to fully assess an employee's performance."

He also said companies should view employees as long-term assets instead of short-term tools. It is not good when employees worry about layoffs, regardless of their performance. He said that in Japan all efforts are made to first reduce costs and lower benefits of top executives to make up for corporate shortcomings.

"It makes no sense to me that some American companies are laying off people while some of their top executives are still making millions," he said.

Atarashi said American companies need to realize their lower-level workers also are a great source of ideas and need to be respected and understood.

On the other hand, respect for individuality was on the top of Atarashi's list of what Japan has to learn from the United States. He said Japan has leaned toward group recognition and synthesis, which tends to stifle creativity and individuality.

While Americans give both material and spiritual incentives to their employees, Japan ignores this basic human need, he said.

Atarashi also said Japan needs to promote more young people and women.

"Promoting women and the young still raises a lot of controversy," he said. "This is hurting Japan obviously because there's a lot of potential being overlooked."

He added that Japan has much to learn from globalization. He said the Japanese seldom socialize with other cultures and still are appointing their own people to positions in foreign countries. Only 4 percent of the 410 Japanese overseas companies have regional employees. He said this is hurting their productivity in these places because of communication barriers.

Atarashi also said Japanese speakers often are poor communicators. He said Americans have more presentational skills than the Japanese because they are required to address audiences more often.

He summarized by saying a company will be more successful if a better understanding of other countries and their practices is achieved.

"We all have something to gain from each other," he said. "First, we must understand our own country before we can understand another."

"It's also very important to see our similarities before looking for our differences. Once the differences are realized and understood, then we must accept them, or be willing to change and modify ourselves before continuing."

The Japan Business Study was established two years ago at the University of Texas. The lecture series is presented by the Center for International Business Studies.

Session two will be from 6:30 to 8 p.m. today in 158 Blocker. Session three will be from 5 to 7 p.m. Nov. 13 in 130 Blocker. Session four will be from 10 to 11:30 a.m. Nov. 16 in 114 Blocker.

Officials end plans to change McFadden Hall to honors dorm

By ELIZABETH TISCH
Of The Battalion Staff

After weeks of debate between the University Honors Program and the Residence Hall Association, McFadden Hall will remain a female dorm and will not be converted to an all-honors residency, the director of UHP says.

Dr. Dale Knobel says a great demand still exists for an honors hall, but using McFadden to meet that demand would not work.

"(Texas A&M President) Dr. (William) Mobley, (Provost and Vice President for Academic Affairs) Dr. (E. Dean) Gage, (Vice President for Student Affairs) Dr. (John) Koldus III and myself decided we all are very pleased with the way Lechner Honors Hall has worked out in its first two years," Knobel says.

"And we are pleased for the demand but feel like we need to be looking forward to the long-term solution, which means more than simply looking at McFadden."

Knobel says he is not sure how to satisfy those wanting honors housing, but the Department of Student Affairs will explore the problem during the next few years.

McFadden President Jana Terry says the decision, made official last Thursday, shows class on the administration's part.

"I think it's just great," she says. "I think it represents really what the University is all about. It's fair and I have a lot more respect for the administration voting in our favor."

The dispute between the UHP and McFadden residents began last spring when UHP and Student Affairs proposed converting the hall into an honors dorm.

However, heated reactions caused the Department of Student Affairs to re-evaluate. In the meantime, Terry and her residents gained support from RHA. RHA passed Bill F9005, which states the conversion of McFadden would be an act of "segregation of students and unequal, preferential treatment of supposedly equal students."

Knobel says, however, UHP's proposal to convert the hall never stated residents would be forced to move out to make room for scholarship students.

"The proposal that was put forward was that spaces that became available only through attrition would be given to the honor students," Knobel said in the Oct. 16 issue of The Battalion.

Knobel says he feels good about the decision allowing McFadden to remain unchanged.
