United Air to fight for jetliner space

LONDON (AP) — Another Battle of Britain is raging but it's not about warplane dominance over the skies. This fight concerns jetliner space on the ground.

United Airlines' bid to fly into Heathrow, announced last month, is expected to intensify the struggle for landing spots at one of the world's busiest airports.

The competition over which airlines can fly to Heathrow is likely to be raised between the U.S. and British governments, which are currently reviewing their air services agreement, the British Department of Transport said.

When United announced Oct. 23 it had purchased most of Pan American World Airways' British air routes for $400 million, the buyer asserted Pan Am's slot at Heathrow was part of the deal.

But since 1977, the British government has barred any new airline from entering crowded Heathrow, and might force United to fly into London and other British airports. American Airlines was told to go to Gatwick when it bought Trans World Airlines' Chicago-Heathrow route in a $195 million deal last year.

"We certainly don't think they (United) have the right to operate out of Heathrow," Lizann Peppard, an American Airlines spokeswoman in London said.

American has indicated an interest in buying the Pan Am routes at a higher price than United is paying, but Pan Am and United say their deal is sealed.

Many international and domestic airlines want slots at Heathrow, which is 20 miles west of London and served by the London subway system. Gatwick, 27 miles south of London, links up with the British Rail train network.

Heathrow has more shops, restaurants and other amenities, and offers far more connecting flights than Gatwick, primarily a center for charter flights.

said. "It was Richards' campaign to lose but Williams lost because of the campaigning and media coverage that did not portray him in the best light," she said.

Hurley says that when analyzing elections, it is important to make a distinction between controlled and uncontrolled campaigning.

Controlled campaigning is ads put out by candidates while uncontrolled campaigning is what the press reports about the candidate.

A student participating in the discussion said negative ads in the gubernatorial campaign did not play a main role in the outcome, whereas negative responses by Richards and Williams in news stories did.

Leighley also gave her observations of the media's effects on elections. She said negative campaigning always has occurred during elections and it is a major factor in campaigns.

But Leighley said negative ads do not always work if people already identify with a party.

Leighley said other factors besides negative campaigning need to be looked at, such as party identification and if candidates are men or women or incumbents. Different demographic groups also must be considered.

Leighley also said images have been portrayed by candidates in campaign ads.

To explain the use of symbols in commercials, Leighley cited how one candidate in the past was shown on TV playing checkers with toy soldiers. The candidate then knocked the soldiers off the board with his arm to symbolize how he wanted to decrease military spending.
