Dallas airline receives expansion opportunity

DALLAS (AP) — The sudden demise of Midway Airlines has given Southwest Airlines, the discount carrier that is a darling of Wall Street as well as air travelers, its greatest expansion opportunity in years, analysts say.

Southwest last week tentatively picked up eight gates at Chicago's Midway Airport, the city's secondary airport and the kind the Dallas-based airline has used for 20 years to build itself into one of the nation's healthiest carriers.

Added to the four gates where Southwest had been operating 44 daily flights, the airline is now perched to build a route system in Chicago that rivals its major competitors in Dallas, Houston and Phoenix, John Denison, executive vice president for Southwest, said last week.

That would mean more than 110 daily flights. The airline will announce the first expansion at Midway within two weeks.

"In that area east of the Mississippi, it's pretty dense, more than it is in Dallas," said Robert Joedicke, airline analyst for Shearson Lehman Brothers Inc. in New York. "There's a terrific potential."

"They now will have a bigger springboard than ever to increase their position there," said George James, president of Airline Economics Inc.
