Fight racism where it exists

This is in answer to all who feel that it is unjust that there are a disproportionate number of blacks serving in the Persian Gulf. Our military currently is all volunteer; no one was forced to join the U.S. armed services. To those claiming they were forced to join because of economic reasons, I say this: Our military is not a social

The charges of racism against the U.S. government are ludicrous. Instead of falsely accusing the government of racism, fight racism where it does exist.

Otherwise, you may lose your credibility.

Consider facts, not propaganda

This letter is in regard to a statement made in Michael Worsham's letter in the Feb. 13 issue of The Battalion. Worsham makes the statement that the United States should stop its "... cruel, unprovoked and expensive bombing of innocent citizens of Iraq."

What Worsham has neglected to consider is that Iraq has been bombing civilians in both Israel and Saudi Arabia almost non-stop since the beginning of the war.

Although there have been very few casualties as a result of these bombings, that still does not excuse Hussein's

Apparently Worsham is buying into the Iraqi propaganda that the baby food plant was really a baby food plant and so on. Maybe he should consider the facts instead of the propaganda before making such a statement.

I'm not saying that turn about is fair play, or that the ends justifies the means.

But maybe we all should look at the facts before con-demning the United States' actions.

Bail out on country?

In response to the foresighted comments of B. Jon Traylor in the Feb. 4 issue of The Battalion, I would like to re-

If the American people were to sit idly by and leave the country every time they opposed the actions of our great yet ever confusing government, as B. Jon Traylor would have us do, there would be only three people left.

And before long Barbara would take leave of President Bush and Mr. Sununu.

War coverage Press shows public reality, horrors of war

In recent weeks, we have seen a ferocious debate concerning the role of the media in covering the war.

For a while, CNN's Peter Arnett was the only American journalist in Baghdad. The fact that he continued to film and graphically describe the civilian damage done by allied air raids in Baghdad provoked a strong reaction from many quarters.

In a controversial speech, Sen. Alan Simpson of Wyoming all but labeled Arnett a traitor emphasizing that "... in our times, we would have called such a person a sympathizer." The senator suggested that only if Arnett were smuggling uncensored stories out of Baghdad would he be considered a hero. Referring to the fact that Arnett's wife is Vietnamese, Simpson implied that Arnett had been a Vietcong sympathizer during the Vietnam War.

Such biting criticism of the media is nothing new. It reflects a commonly held belief that the press should not report what may constitute a propaganda victory for the enemy, even if it directly contradicts government claims. To these critics, reports filed by American journalists in Baghdad are indistinguishable from official Iraqi communiques, and therefore serve no useful purpose. On the contrary, they claim, journalists are playing right into Saddam's hands by only selectively reporting allied setbacks.

It is well known that Iraq censors all reports emanating from Baghdad. Indeed, the United States does the same. In fact, several journalists were recently detained for up to 12 hours against their will by the U.S. military for attempting to interview troops on their own, outside the tightly controlled press pools.

The hue and cry raised over reporters such as Arnett is precisely because there is indeed a large difference between reports filed by Western journalists and Saddam Hussein's propaganda.

The bunker bombing is a case in point. Imagine if not a single journalist had been in Baghdad during the bombing. The administration could then doubtlessly have dismissed films of the damage as Iraqi propaganda. After all, Iraqi TV has shown old film clips of Basra devastated during the Iran-Iraq war, claiming that the damage was inflicted by allied bombing. The fact that journalists were there in person, and saw the charred bodies of women and children being pulled out with their own eyes, made the denial of the occurence of the incident impossible. The presence of journalists like Arnett, veterans of many a conflict, lends credibility to actual events which would otherwise have been easy to dismiss as Saddam' propaganda. Scenes of the bunker bombing were not those the administration wanted Americans to see; far from the impersonal, aerial bombing shots, these were close-upso the horrors of war - images of people just like you and me; images of what war really is like.

It cannot be denied that there is a case for the argument that reporting allied failures can only help Saddamir exploiting them to his advantage. But that is not the point. Our society derives its real strength not from our marvelous hi-tech weaponry or our giant economic prowess. The reason why America is one of the greatest countries in the world is because it allows the Peter Arnetts and the Alan Simpsons to coexist.

It is true that the press often takes adversarial role with regards to the government. However, it is equally true that Americans have been lied to time and again, by practically every administration. Vietnam, Watergate and Iran-contra are too recent to forget Under these circumstances, who can blame the press for exhibiting the skepticism it often does?

And if in its relentless search for truth (or a story), the press does play into the enemy's hands, then it is a price we must pay for keeping our society truly free — and far more livable than Saddam's Iraq.

Let's do something besides robbing the poor

Sixty-six percent of Texas citizens favor a state lottery to raise revenues, according to a survey conducted by The Eppstein Group in Fort Worth. I, too, support a state lottery ... I think.

You see, I — like a lot of others — am concerned that the people who will buy lottery tickets will be the poor who are optimistic enough to believe they might actually win a lottery, and money they should be spending on food and shelter will end up going toward lottery tickets.

Yep, even though I think a state lottery would help the economy, I wouldn't buy a ticket myself. The odds are so bad against me winning, I would think it was just plain silly to spend money on such a thing.

However, some people might really

Ellen Hobbs Columnist

start to believe they have more than a snowball's chance in hell of winning the lottery. Not everybody will realize they're being duped into making a silly purchase.

So, instead of trying to make money by enticing people to buy lottery tickets, which some people aren't going to realize is silly, I've designed a plan of making people who buy really silly stuff help us take care of our money problems.

Here's the plan: We should just tax the hell out of things we think are really silly, like scented erasers, dolls that pull their pants down, fruit roll-ups, New Kids On The Block remix albums, decorative wind socks, that

It would work like this: Each voting district would select two people to be part of the Silly Tariff Proposal Board. They could do this by election, by asking for volunteers or whatever. The only stipulation is that nobody could do it twice (that'll keep it more interesting).

ach proposal board member will have to come up with one thing that people buy that they think is silly. They then submit their idea to the board chairman, whose name was selected out of a hat.

If two members submit the same silly thing, the one who brought it in second has to come up with a new idea.

A list of all the ideas would be compiled and presented to the general public for a vote during regular elections. Voters then can pick up to 50 things that they think are really silly and ought to be taxed.

The top 50 items selected would then have an attached 25 percent state sales tax for one year.

The taxed items, like the members of the Silly Tariff Proposal Board, would naturally rotate. That way, no one industry — say, the scented eraser industry - would feel the bite of the taxation for more than one year.

And I dare say that the companies producing scented erasers would realize they deserved to be taxed.

The members of the board would switch quickly (there would be so many of them), and they would never actually meet, just mail in their ideas. This would make it quite difficult for the scented eraser lobby from bribing members not to propose that their product be taxed.

To me, this plan seems to me to hit the most deserving consumers with the extra financial burden to keep this state on its feet.

I suppose it's got its flaws, but what revenue raising plan doesn't?

The best thing about it is that it will eliminate the guilt we're gonna feelif we implement a lottery and get our revenue from the poor and destitute. And with this war going on, who needs more guilt?
