Smog levels in Mexico City lead to alert

MEXICO CITY (AP) — The government declared a rare second-stage smog alert Thursday, telling people to avoid outdoor exercise and ordering the dirtiest factories in northern Mexico City to cut operations by half.

Citizens were also urged to drive only when "strictly necessary."

It was only the second time the government has declared a second-level alert. There are three alert levels in the plan for reducing activity when smog reaches dangerous levels in this city of more than 15 million people.

Ozone levels at four monitoring stations hit nearly three times the level the government considers satisfactory when the alert was declared at midday.

"The immediate effects are irritation of the eyes and pulmonary effects, but the long term damage is premature aging of the body and this is very, very serious," said Homero Aridjis, president of the Group of 100, one of Mexico's leading environmental groups.

Ozone levels continued to rise at two of the monitoring stations after the alert was declared, said Sergio Reyes Lujan, deputy secretary of urban development and ecology.

"Predictions were that the high ozone concentrations could persist for a good part of the afternoon," he said at a news conference.

The 60 most contaminating industries in the northern part of the city were told to scale back operations 50 percent.

They included the government's March 18 oil refinery and petrochemical plants, two thermoelectric plants, a major copper smelter, other metal plants and foundries, and glassmaking plants, officials said.

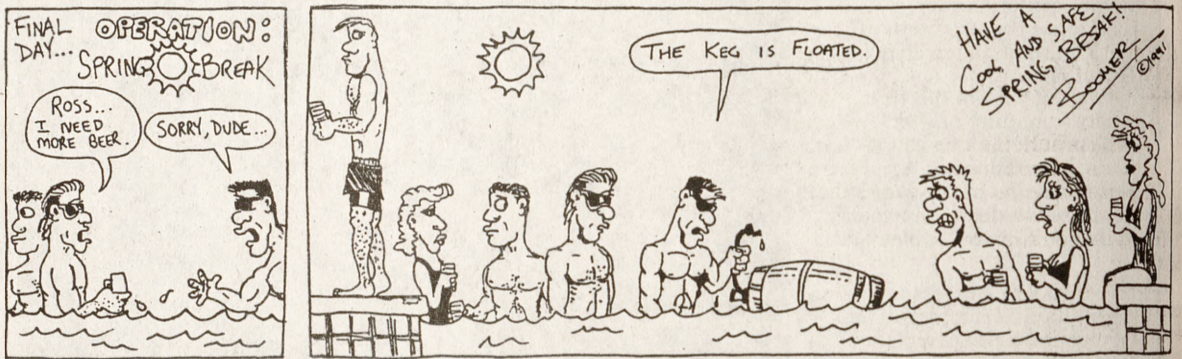

"Today there was no wind, even at an altitude of 13,200 feet," Reyes Lujan said, explaining why a second-stage alert was called.

Gates

sues in the last presidential campaign had to do with equitable access to higher education," he said.

"Pollsters on both sides found this was an issue that made the American heart skip a beat."

Gates said equal opportunity in education is an idea that has very broad appeal in America and gives an indication of what education means in this country.

He said the current lack of equal educational opportunity is the result of several long-standing social pressures and attitudes.

Gates said some of these same contradictions and ambivalences, ones he faced in his youth, are still very much in evidence today.

"The word overachiever meant something different than it does today," he said. "Then it was a kid who didn't understand his place, his limitations or his natural capacity. A colored boy who knew more than he was supposed to know was headed for a nervous breakdown."

Gates said the shortcomings of education are numerous not only in opportunities available to blacks but also in terms of curriculum offerings.

He said the world-wide dominance America has enjoyed is threatened by the vast ignorance of other languages and cultures in higher education.

"The tendency of colleges and high schools to center on America and Europe is too narrow a view, he said, and the benefits of a more international perspective are numerous.

This narrow view, he said, has led to a new fragmentation — dividing the west from the rest. This is not justifiable in theory nor desirable in practice, he said.

Multicultural studies in a variety of subjects could vastly benefit other studies in the humanities, Gates said.

"The study of the humanities is the study of the possibilities of human life in culture," he said. "It thrives on diversity."

"We need to reform our entire system of core curriculum to account for the incomparable eloquence of the African, Asian, Latin American, Native American and Middle Eastern traditions to prepare our students for their role in the 21st century as citizens of a world culture."
