

Fall 1991 offers new minor for students interested in religious studies administrators did not believe it was the role of a public university to teach religion. He said people also misunderstood what the courses involved.

Stadelmann has been at A&M for 23 years and teaches four religious studies courses.

"What I try to do is teach the religions from the stand point of that religion and why people would believe it," he said.

Paul Parrish, associate dean of the College of Liberal Arts, said he is not aware of any problems caused by the new policy recognizing religious studies as a minor.

"If there is some resistance it would be based upon a misunderstanding of what is taught in these courses," he said.

Stadelmann said, however, no matter how objective you teach religion, some people still will get angry.

"I have had students threaten me and pray for me, which is quite all right," he said. "But people take religion strongly, and it does not matter how objective you may be teaching it."

Oberhelman said the religious studies program now offers students 15 courses that deal with the psychology of religion, women in the Bible and mythology. More courses will be added in the future, he said.

"The minor has been set up to expose students to a multi-disciplinary and multi-theoretical approach to religion and does not advocate one particular religion or one set of beliefs," Oberhelman said.

A&M already has three other interdisciplinary programs in the liberal arts college, including women studies, classical studies and a prepared lecture program that will begin next year.

Religious study courses are available in the anthropology, English, history, modern and classical languages, philosophy and humanities, psychology and sociology departments.

"I have had students threaten me and pray for me, which is quite all right. But people take religion strongly, and it does not matter how objective you may be teaching it."

—Dr. Steve Oberhelman, program coordinator
