NRC fines TU Electric for falsified records

DALLAS (AP) — A nuclear plant's owner and operator will be fined by regulators for apparent violation of federal requirements for fire watch controls at the facility, the government said Thursday.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission said it cited TU Electric, which runs the Comanche Peak nuclear power plant, because employees of a utility contractor hired for fire watch patrols allegedly falsified records.

The NRC said records showed the workers had inspected assigned areas at one-hour intervals when they had reportedly not done so at the plant, which has been plagued by repeated shutdowns.

The Dallas-based utility has 30 days to pay the $50,000 civil penalty or to contest it. The company may also request a hearing if a protest is denied, but has not decided whether to contest the fine, said TU Electric's David Fiorelli.

He said the utility had informed the government of the discrepancies in fire watch records and began correcting weaknesses in the fire patrols.

An NRC inspection in January confirmed that numerous fire watch records were reportedly inaccurate and that the utility's management and oversight of the program was weak.
