Roberts plays 'unschooled, tough-but-vulnerable' role in tear-jerker 'Dying Young'

continuously peering through doorways at Hilary, symbolizing Victor's isolation and exclusion, and his longing to be a participant in life, not just a voyeur.

Richard Friedenberg has done an excellent job of transforming Marti Leimbach's novel, written as an inner monologue from Hilary's point of view, into an evocative, dramatic screenplay.

Roberts again shows her impressive range as the feisty-yet-nurturing Hilary, giving herself generously to the camera's endlessly probing close-ups, conveying every ounce of pain and joy with her expressively plastic features.

Campbell Scott's performance is equally stunning as his character goes from extreme sickness to athletic vigor, shyness to extroversion, desperate need to smug arrogance. There are a couple of painfully realistic scenes where he tries to prove his worth by demonstrating his knowledge of artsy trivia while watching Jeopardy with Hilary and Gordon. Scott is definitely an actor to watch.

"Dying Young" is well made and while deliberately paced and certainly not perfect, it is for the most part an extremely moving and convincing character study. I could be very picky and point out some plot loopholes, but they would give too much away, so I won't. There is evidence, however, as entertainment rags have been reporting, that the ending was tampered with after test audiences found it too sad. Even the title was under consideration for change when studio execs were fearful moviegoers might stay away, thinking Roberts' character dies. Whatever its faults, the quiet, thoughtful nature of the film will be a welcome respite from the slambang violence of the majority of summer films, and is a must for Julia-watchers. This is a perfect date movie, but be sure to wear waterproof mascara and bring plenty o' Kleenex - you'll need it!

'Jungle Fever' gives view of racial tensions

and Ossie Davis who steal scenes they're in playing eccentric parents.

The only flaws I saw in a genuinely fine film were an occasionally obtrusive soundtrack, some unnecessary violence towards the end that really did have that much to do with the storyline. In general, there were few too many storylines, the one being the story about Flipper, drug addict brother, which really relate to the main plot.

And although Lee has publicly expressed his disapproval of interracial couples (which shows through in some parts of the film) he nonetheless provides food for thought in a movie that explores problems but does not present a narrow point of view.

All in all it is on the same level as Lee's 1989 masterpiece "Do the Right Thing," but the two films are hard to compare because of drastically different directing styles used. "Jungle Fever" was shot in a very matter-of-fact style while "Do the Right Thing" bordered a touch of fantasy and surrealism. Despite the hoopla around the film (apparently he was up again at the Cannes Film Festival when his film didn't take the prize), Lee is a gifted director who is making a genuinely intimate statement about life in America the '80s and '90s.

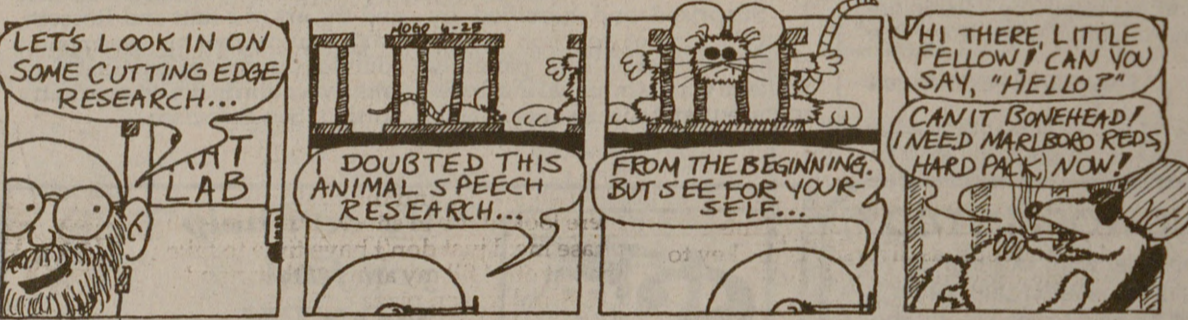

His films are quality art and just platforms for his views. He doesn't blame Caucasians for the problems in the world, rather he points out the problems that exist and that members of races (Italian, Jewish, Black, Hispanic) are partially to blame because of the prejudices that exist within all of us.

As such, "Jungle Fever" (his fifth commercial film) is a representation of many of the problems and anxieties in modern society, and one that should not be missed.
