Beutal Health Center can handle, then they are treated here on campus, Wait says. "But this is not an emergency room, it's a minor emergency clinic," Wait said. "Anything we can't handle, we give the patient a choice of where they want us to take them — either Humana or St. Joseph's. If they are unconscious then we take them to the nearest hospital." Wait says the EMS team has been fortunate not to have had any serious mass-casualty accidents on campus. "We've had some minor ones, like after March to the Brazos and Bloody Cross, which usually result in heat exhaustion and minor injuries," Wait says. During such events, he says, two or three ambulances will normally be stationed nearby to reduce treatment time. In addition to having an ambulance crew available around the clock, there is also a paramedic on call as well as a health center staff physician, who offers criticism and extra manpower, if needed, and who also may serve as liaison if other emergency units are also on the scene. "We try to provide the most effective and up-to-date care that we are able," Wait says. "We try to get the patient treated and taken care of as quickly as possible and do as much as we can for them."

vice, you're more likely to get repeat business," she said. Instructors from A&M also used the training program at Sea World to train instructors who in turn trained the 2,300 Sea World employees. "They thought this program was so good they didn't develop their own," Coppennoll said. "This brings a lot of credibility to the program."

Coppennoll said follow-up research conducted in cities that used the program found that participants had a stronger sense of pride in their work, and people were more aware of the pride. Managers of the employees in the training program told researchers they also noticed an increase in employee morale. Patti Sears, information/tourism specialist at the Bryan and College Station Convention and Visitor Bureau, said she feels strongly about the program and considers it an excellent benefit to the community. Sears said the program targets "front-line" employees and managers who are often the first to encounter visitors to the community, such as in hotel and retail businesses.

"We've gotten a good response, and we have full training classes," she said. "We hope to make this an on-going program." Sears said she hopes the program will make employees and managers more knowledgeable of the community and increase hospitality to visitors. "We want to help the community be more aware of what's here and improve on what we're already doing," she said.
