Video Review

'The Pistol: The Making of a Legend,' 'Hoosiers'

By Timm Doolen
The Battalion

When I heard there was a movie about "Pistol" Pete Meravich, I thought it would be another one of those Hollywood biographies, this time about an American basketball hero who died of a heart attack in January of 1988 in his early 40s.

Instead of trying to cram more than 40 years of Meravich's life into an hour and a half, the movie focuses on one basketball season. The season is chosen from his eighth-grade year in school, when he played for the varsity high school team. Instead of focusing on his college days where he was the all-time leading college scorer, averaging 44 points per game, writer-director Frank Schroeder expands on a turning point in Meravich's life when he really had to prove himself for the first time as the short, young guy surrounded by seniors.

The film takes place in Meravich's hometown, Clemson, South Carolina, in 1959, where his father, Press Meravich, is the college basketball coach and a retired professional player. Thirteen-year-old Pete looks up to his father as a guiding force in his life (and future life).

Meravich is played by Adam Guier who is short on acting ability but can really handle a basketball. The performance by Pete's dad (Nick Benedict) is much better, playing the inspiration to his son.

The biggest problem I have with the movie is that it feels like an ABC after-school special - it's full of inspirational and motivational speeches. And there's a number of sequences where Pete and the team are shown practicing with a cheesy near-rock soundtrack in the background.

One good point is it avoids a typical Hollywood ending (then again, it is based on a true story, so the ending is more than likely based on fact).

The film is pretty good if you are interested in this legendary basketball player's early inspirations, or if you are in the mood for some good, squeaky clean family entertainment. Overall it has few elements that apply to a broad audience of a college age.

Previewed videos are courtesy of 2-Day Video.

Watching "Pistol" reminded me of a movie that came out in 1986, "Hoosiers," which stars Gene Hackman, Dennis Hopper and Barbara Hershey.

Whereas "Pistol" is about one boy's struggles to make it against the odds, "Hoosiers" is about an old coach's struggle to bring a small, conservative town into the future.

Set in 1951 Hickory, Indiana, Norman Dale (Hackman) is the new coach who has to try to whip an old, tired town into new ways of playing basketball.

But the town doesn't agree with the coach's methods and almost removes him from the position. In Indiana, they take their basketball more seriously than Texans take their football, especially in small towns.

Director David Anspaugh keeps the story and game footage tight, making a realistic and well-done story of high school basketball, that has as much to do with the concept of change (of a town and of a person) as it does the game itself.
