Committee hears gang members' testimony

EDINBURG (AP) - Young men and boys are drawn to gangs by the allure of "power, sex and drugs" and the best way to prevent their joining is to offer them alternatives, former gang members said Wednesday.

"You tell a child to say 'No' to gangs, but yes to what?" said Jesse, a community worker and former gang member who asked to be identified only by a pseudonym.

"You've gotta offer them something," Jesse said. "They say they need things to do."

Jesse was among several gang members who testified in secret before a House subcommittee studying the growing gang problem in Texas. The subcommittee Wednesday also held the first in a series of statewide public hearings to solicit input legislators hope to use in crafting anti-gang legislation later this year.

"The bottom line is we're losing a generation of children and we want to prevent that," said subcommittee Chairman Eddie De La Garza, D-Edinburg.

De La Garza said the subcommittee has until August to complete its report. The legislation should be filed by November of December, he said.

Law enforcement officials and community activists told the three-member panel that prevention is the best solution to the problem.

When that fails, tough enforcement is necessary to prevent first offenders from becoming repeat offenders and to keep the incorrigible under control, said David Neubauer, a spokesman for the Hidalgo County Sheriff's Department.

"The only way we're going to get around this is to get first-time offenders and scare 'em," Neubauer said. "We scare the heck out of them to where they're not going to commit anymore crimes."

But Jesse and other former gang members said outside the hearing room that the threat of punishment has little impact on gang members.

The former members would only talk on the condition of anonymity.

"It (being arrested) comes with the package," Jesse said.

State investigates evangelist Tilton

DALLAS (AP) - The state attorney general's office said Wednesday it has asked televangelist Robert Tilton for dozens of financial records and other documents in its probe of consumer fraud violations at Tilton's Word of Faith ministry.

The Consumer Protection Division asked for documents including tax and credit card records, cancelled checks, property lists and promotions materials.

The office, in a letter dated Jan. 10, also requested testimonials or complaints from people who have sent money, or anything else of value to the Farmers Branch church or to Tilton.

"We're not commenting on the investigation at this time. The letter speaks for itself," said Gray McBride, a spokesman for the attorney general.
