Candidates offer plans for better representation

"This would give the international students a greater understanding of A&M, and a greater incentive to participate," she said.

Candidate Steve Beller said he planned to improve the representation of all students by setting up an advisory board composed of students drawn from the diverse University population.

"No matter who you are or what you do, we're all Aggies," Beller said. "I'll set up a Presidential Advisory Board with regular students on it, to give students better representation."

"With this board in place, I would be in constant contact with students on issues that affect them, and will be better able to work in their interest."

Beller also took a strong stand on the issue of having a student on the Texas A&M University System Board of Regents by opposing such a plan.

"Having a student on the Board of Regents sounds good, but most people don't realize that the Regents oversee more than just Texas A&M," he said. "We can't say we're the prime school in the system by having one of our students on the board. The smaller system schools already complain they don't get fair representation."

"I propose an advisory committee made up of representatives from each of the system schools to advise the Regents on matters that affect the student bodies," Beller said.

Cash, however, strongly supported a non-voting student regent, calling on the student body to begin calling their legislators to gain their support.

"We've got to lobby the legislature," Cash said. "Last year, a student regent bill made it through the state senate, but died in the house."

"We need to organize the students, provide them with the addresses of their representatives, and get them writing," she said. "That's the way we can get this done, by showing this is what we want."

Ansbach also supported a non-voting student regent, and said another bill would be prepared for submission to the legislature, but with a few differences from the original one.

"I worked with the legislature study group that came up with the first proposal, which called for two non-voting student regents," Ansbach said. "This year we're trying for just one student regent."

"There have been students working on this project since the 1970s," he said. "This year we got some young, new energy workers who I believe will get the job done, once they get oriented and that's what I'm going for with."

Although Brooks supported non-voting student regents, said his main focus would be changing the approach taken to win over legislators.

"Last year the bill was killed just one senator that didn't like the concept," he said. "To get the bill passed we need to start cultivating relationships with the legislators through the Association of Regent Students and students' hometowns."

"The committee set up to look for a student regent was a big failure because of dissension between member schools," Brooks said. "We have to try a different approach."

Ansbach praises election committee's decision

"You don't expect things like this to happen at A&M," Ansbach said. "But since it did happen, the election commission followed it up properly and James (Phipps) did a good job investigating the incident. I'm happy with the outcome."

Election Commissioner James Phipps would not comment on the findings. "They (the findings) speak very well for themselves."

The judgement of the commission is based on Article I, Section IV, letter K of the Election Regulations. The regulation states, "All members of the Election Commission and candidates participating in the elections, shall conduct themselves according to the Aggie Code of Honor."

Brooks is not the only candidate to incur a fine for election rules violations. Phipps said

Thursday that there had been 12 to 18 infractions to date, but declined to name any aggressors.

Phipps did say that the election commission would post a list of fines accrued by candidates, but after student elections were over.

When asked why the commission would wait until after the elections to post the Phipps answered, "To be honest, because that's the way I want to do it."

NOW marches to raise rape awareness

Milburne said the recent rapes in the Bryan/College Station area fueled the campus organization's desire for a protest against such violence.

"There have been three rapes in Bryan/College Station in the last three months and there hasn't been a single event addressing the growing need to make people aware that the problem is on our campus," Milburne said. "I have never heard about a rape that has occurred in our community before this year. I don't think it's widely publicized."

"Every woman and child is a potential target of male violence," Milburne said. "Together we can change our woman-hating culture."

During her portion of the program, Stock read an emotional poem to the crowd about friends that were victims of rape and murder.

Stock was interrupted by a passing unit of cadets who marched within fifteen feet of her, drowning her out with their cadence.

Stock rolled her eyes and remarked, "We're really impressed, aren't we. Some people will do anything for attention."

After finishing the poem in a wavering voice, Stock told the listeners that she was tired of being afraid.

"I don't think this is going to stop until women fight back," Stock said, brandishing a 90,000-volt stun gun she brought with her as an example of self-defense devices.

"I bought a Smith & Wesson .38 special and if I hear a noise in my house, I have it," Stock said. "I would hate to have to use it, but it was better to buy a gun than to die like my friend did."

Linda Castoria of the Rape Crisis Center spoke during the event and laid some of the blame for the violence against women on the status quo.

"To accept things just because they exist is to turn our backs on women who have been violated," Castoria said. "We must have freedom to go everywhere at any time and not fear for our lives or dignity."

Castoria said society perpetuates violence by blaming women.

"Do you comment that you shouldn't have been in a certain place at a certain time?" she said. "No one has the right to force sex on anyone."
