quested an investigation.

WASHINGTON (AP) - Three environmental groups released a study Tuesday they claimed debunked shrimpers' claims that protecting endangered sea turtles would reduce shrimp catches while causing more injuries and equipment losses.

"After two full seasons of required (turtle excluder device) use . . . , it is clear that none of the opponents' predictions were accurate," the

The study was prepared by the Center for Marine Conservation, the Environmental Defense Fund and National Wildlife Federation.

The turtle excluder devices, which are trap doors placed in shrimpers' nets to allow sea turtles an escape hatch, have been hotly contested by the shrimping industry. The airbreathing turtles easily drown in the nets, which can trawl continuously for hours.

"We have technology that saves turtles" which are endangered species and the same technology has not brought economic ruin to the industry as TEDs opponents had predicted," said Marydele Donnelly, director of the Center for Marine Conservation's sea turtle conservation program. "So, it's a win-win proposition."

The TEDs are designed to save the lives of five threatened and endangered turtle species in southern U.S. waters, including the endangered Kemp's ridley.

analyzed

Before the use of TEDs, up to 55,000 sea turtles died each year in American shrimp nets, the National Academy of Sciences estimates.

Among the study's findings:
• In 1990 and 1991, shrimp catches in the Gulf of Mexico, measured in terms of pounds caught per days fished, were higher than the previous three years when TEDs were not required. Off the South Carolina coast, total shrimp catch was higher in 1991 than in the five previous years. • There have been no reported injuries associated with TEDs since federal requirements took effect in September 1989.

 Insurance claims for gear loss and damage have declined since TEDs implementation.

 Strandings of drowned threatened and endangered sea turtles were dramatically lower during periods in which TEDs were required.

Donnelly said the environmental grou hope to use the report in part to prod the B administration to speed up its release of e panded protection for sea turtles.

For the last eight months, the National Management rine Fisheries Service has been drafting regulations that would expand the use of TEDs.

We have been more than patient about of this," Donnelly said Tuesday. "We ho that with the information that's provided this report that people who have been just so of sitting back and waiting for something happen will now make it happen."

NMFS is looking at regulations that would make TEDs use mandatory year-round in the Gulf of Mexico and Atlantic Ocean. The new rules would also give the Coast Guard greate enforcement powers.

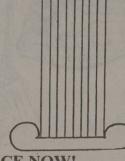

Under existing federal rules, shrim trawlers must have a certified TED in their nes from March 1 through Nov. 30 in the Gulf Mexico, and May 1 through Aug. 31 in the At
