

Town asks TABC to limit licenses

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN — The Houston suburb of Jacinto City, population 9,300, may become the site of a ground-breaking battle over regulation of alcohol sales in Texas. The town is asking the Texas Alcoholic Beverage Commission for a rule that, for the first time, would allow the agency to limit the number of places "licensed to sell alcoholic beverages in cities in order to protect the general health, peace, welfare, morals and safety of Texas citizens."

Under the rule proposed by Jacinto City, if TABC officials determine that a city has a "sufficient number" of establishments selling alcoholic beverages, applicants for additional permits could be rejected.

While the main target is bars, the rule could affect convenience stores, restaurants and package stores as well, the Austin American-Statesman reported Monday.

"Right now, cities in Texas have no way to control the number of permits for bars that can be issued by TABC, yet we have to pay for the consequences — zoning problems, crime, you name it," said Jim DeFoyd, city attorney for Jacinto City.

"We don't want a situation in our small city like you have on Richmond Avenue (in Houston) or on Sixth Street in Austin, where there is one bar right after another. That would be a disaster for us," he said.
