Nixon could not resume POW search, official says

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The top military officer at the end of the Vietnam War told a Senate panel Thursday that the nation "didn't have the stomach" to resume fighting over possible unreleased POWs after peace had been negotiated.

Adm. Thomas Moorer, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1970 to 1974, said it was politically impossible for President Nixon to reopen the war in 1973 on the unconfirmed possibility that not all Americans had been returned from Laos.

At that time, Nixon had concluded peace talks with the North Vietnamese. The government of Laos was not represented in the negotiations. And Nixon was preparing to hold welcoming ceremonies for U.S. POWs released under those Paris peace accords.

"We would have had to go to Laos... and physically sweep out the whole area," Moorer said.

"We didn't have the stomach for it. We didn't have the will," Moorer said.

Moorer testified before the Senate Select Committee on POW/MIA Affairs as it held a third day of hearings with former military and Nixon administration officials from two decades ago.

Some former officials have testified there was reason to believe that more Americans than the nine eventually released from Laos had been held in that country as a result of the fighting in Southeast Asia.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger also acknowledged the possibility there may have been more living Americans in Laos, though he denounced as "a flat-out lie" the allegation U.S. officials knowingly abandoned Americans there.
