Clemens hints at possible trade to Rangers

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS — Houston native Roger Clemens says he'd like to be throwing fireballs in his home state.

Boston Red Sox officials say they're not interested in trading their All Star pitcher.

But Clemens said he is encouraged by media reports of early trade talks between the Red Sox and Texas Rangers.

"I'd love to come closer to home," Clemens said Monday at a celebrity golf tournament south of Houston. "Anybody in his right mind would."

The Rangers appeal to Clemens for several reasons: He would be closer to home and his two young children.

And he would like to return to the "environment" in which he grew up and pitched, at Houston's Spring Woods High School and at the University of Texas in Austin.

He said he liked the prospect of pitching for a team he considers a pennant contender. The Red Sox finished last in the American League East with a record of 73-89.

"I'm concerned with our ball-club," he said of the Red Sox. "Finishing last for the first time wasn't a great deal of fun."

Clemens, 30, said he isn't sure how sincere Boston officials are about keeping him. He said he was surprised to learn through the media of a possible deal with Texas.

He all but ruled out a desire to play for the Houston Astros, saying the price they would have to pay would gut the team of its talent.

"And I'd be back in the same boat."

For all the talk, though, Clemens said he did not expect to be traded.

Rangers managing general partner George W. Bush told The Dallas Morning News it may be impossible to work out a deal with the Red Sox. Club sources recently indicated that Boston was interested in major league home run-leader Juan Gonzalez.

"I don't think Boston wants to get rid of (Clemens)," Bush said Monday. "We've called them every year and told them of our back. As far as I know, they're happy with him."

"I wish there was something there, but I don't think there is"

Linemen

"It was a big factor having him back last week."

Ellisor said he was especially pumped up for the Tech game, since he had been doing one of his least favorite things for two games — watching from the sidelines.

"I had been sitting out for two weeks, and I came ready to play," Ellisor said. "Sitting on the sideline sucks."

A&M head coach R.C. Slocum, who saw Ellisor, Harrison and Wesley miss spring practice because of injuries, said he felt his line had progressed a great deal, and that the unit had done a good job of recovering from the time missed.

"I'm really pleased with the progress the line has made, considering the time they missed during the spring," Slocum said. "They have established that we can run the ball pretty effectively."

Slocum also said one of the reasons the line was beginning to enjoy success was the number of leaders he had within the squad.

"When John returned, that gave us the senior leadership we had been missing for the past few weeks," Slocum said. "Dausin is also a leader-type of player, and we've also seen a lot of improvement in our line. We've seen Jason Mathews get better each week, and I hope everything keeps falling into place."

With running backs like Hill and Rodney Thomas running behind the line, Dausin said blocking became that much sweeter.

"With those two back there, any defense we play is just going to be shaking in their pants," Dausin said. "I especially like watching Rodney, because he won't try to juke anyone, he'll just run over them."

"Any lineman will tell you when a back gives that extra effort and gives as much effort as the line does, it really pumps you up. If you see Rodney or Greg go into the secondary and put someone on their back, it gives me even more incentive to play even harder."

Ellisor and Harrison echoed Dausin's comments, saying that seeing the backs run as well as they do makes them want to play that much harder.

"Knowing those guys are back there is a great treat for an offensive lineman, because they are always one step away from breaking the big play," Ellisor said. "Even though our style involves long, 15-play drives, it helps the line when we're tired knowing they can break it anytime."

Harrison said: "Those guys are hard every play, and you have to bring them down. You can't tackle either one of those guys."

Harrison, a junior from Arlington, said the key to the line's success so far and for the rest of the season boils down to hard work both during the games and during weekly practice.

"We practice the same way we play every day," Harrison said. "We don't come out in half-pants every day and just get in people's way. We come out four days a week hitting and ready to get after it in each practice."

Lady Aggies

Givens said that tonight's match will give Williams a chance to strut her stuff and expand upon her improvement in practice.

"She's not had the opportunity to start before, but we felt she was ready," he said. "We're going to give her the chance to prove it."

"In practice, she's been playing well, and has earned the right to start."

Givens has made another move to shake up A&M's stagnant offense, removing Genny Wood from her setting duties and playing her exclusively at outside attacker in order to improve the Lady Aggies' passing.

"Part of our offensive problems stem from our problems at the passing game," Givens said. "Genny is our best passer, and Suzy (Wente) is starting to get a feel (for playing setter at the college level)."

The A&M junior and leader in assists has put her personal goals second to team needs with her new duties.

"It'll be different for me," Wood said. "I'll have more passing responsibilities, and that's what we need."

Givens spoke highly of Wood and her commitment to her teammates.

"Genny is a team player," he said. "Her attitude is 'Whatever I can do for the team to get better.' That (playing her exclusively at attacker) would be like taking your quarterback and moving him to running back, if you want to use that analogy."

Wood and her teammates might want to take on the attitude of a mean, hard-hitting linebacker tonight as they try to regain the killer instinct that the Lady Aggies used so well earlier in the season.

A&M flew out to hot starts against Texas Tech and Houston, but were unable to slam the door in each match.

"Right now, we're looking to be more consistent and not let teams come back like against Houston," she said. "I mean, we were kicking their butts in the first game and let them come back."

"Once they (A&M opponents) start playing better, we have to, too."

Whether the Lady Aggies will get the chance to be tested tonight is a mystery. Baylor has won eight of their last nine matches, but their only conference win has come against lowly Rice.

Despite any questions about the lack of a tough schedule, Baylor's individual numbers are some of the best in the conference.

Heather Williams leads the SWC in kill average at 3.81 per game, followed by teammate Jenny DeLue with 3.29. And setter Cory Siverston is second in the conference in hitting percentage with a .397 clip.

Baylor's potent offense carries a team hitting percentage of .265 into the match, compared to A&M's .179.

don't get to decide who plays where on Jan. 1.

That's right, those pesky AP sports writers get to decide who comes to the Cotton Bowl and play our boys on New Year's Day, a situation that must stick in the craw of every God-fearing coach in America.

There is something this season known as the Bowl Alliance.

What that means, in simple terms, is that the four major bowls not locked into conference matchups will share the wealth in an attempt to match up the two best available teams on New Year's Day.

The Rose Bowl is not part of the alliance since it hosts the winner of the Pac-10 conference against the winner of the Big 10 conference, which today would be Washington and Michigan, both of whom are ahead of the Aggies.

That leaves us with the Cotton, Sugar, Orange and Fiesta bowls as the major players in the alliance, all having an opportunity to host a national championship contest.

The alliance includes those four bowls and the conference representative which goes with all but the Fiesta bowl, and teams that are independent of any bowl affiliation, including Miami, Florida State and Notre Dame.

The winner of the Southwest Conference goes to the Cotton Bowl, the Southeast Conference champion goes to the Sugar Bowl, and the Big 8 winner goes to the Orange Bowl.

As of today, those three teams would likely be A&M, Alabama and Colorado.

The Alliance will match the highest-ranked independent team with the highest-ranked team represented in either the Cotton, Orange, or Sugar bowls.

Or if two independents are ranked ahead of the conference teams, then they will play in the Fiesta Bowl.

That would mean that Miami, currently ranked second behind Rose Bowl bound Washington by just one point, would play Alabama and any chance the Aggies have at a national title would be gone.

The Aggies aren't getting nearly as much respect from the writers as an undefeated team that has played quality opponents should be getting.

That is unfortunate, but understandable.

We played what was perceived to be a good Texas Tech team and squeaked by them on a last second field goal.

Unfortunately, Tech marched into Raleigh, N.C. the next week and had their heads handed to them on the way out of town as 25th-ranked North Carolina State went on to a 48-13 romp and upped their record to

That is not the worst of it. Stanford is lurking back at the eighth spot this week and if they beat No. 1 Washington in two weeks, watch out.

And there is an ugly mood out there when it comes to the Aggies.

We all know that the Aggies traveled to California in August and defeated the Cardinal, spoiling the homecoming of Bill Walsh. But there aren't many people out there who think we would beat them this week.

spoke to one AP voter who said exactly that, and then voted accordingly.

So let the team play, and the coaches coach, and go out to Kyle Field, and yell until you cough up a lung Saturday because this team has got to start dominating other teams and move up in the polls.

And if my word isn't good enough for you, find President Moblely and ask him.
