Corps

"People are trying to change the Corps so much," he said. "I don't think that's good. It's changing identity so much, I would say within 10 to 20 years it will be just like a military academy. And that scares me."

"That isn't the Texas A&M Corps of Cadets." Further, cadets also said many changes to prevent harassment and discrimination have failed to get much attention, including the requirement that all cadets sign a no-tolerance policy on discrimination and harassment.

"As far as the policies, I haven't seen much of them," the senior cadet said. "I couldn't tell you if they were helping or not. I don't think signing a paper does it. It may make you aware, but after an hour, you've forgotten you had signed it."

As for the female cadets, some have expressed satisfaction with the direction the Corps is heading, but they are more pleased with the fact that the organization has survived the controversy last fall.

"I can't see Texas A&M without the Corps," Joanna Hetsko said. "Also, there are a lot of old A&M out there who don't want to see the Corps go away."

"Someone asked me before, 'What it would be for me to leave the Corps?'" she said. "We would have to be a big, big deal for me to leave."
Corps Commander Matt Michaels said he sees the challenges the changes will bring.

"This is the hand we've been dealt whether people like it or not. This is the direction the Corps has to take."

- Matt Michaels, Corps Commander

"This is the hand we've been dealt whether people like it or not," he said. "This is the direction the Corps has to take. I'm glad that we've trusted to be the ones to lead the way as far as university is concerned with dealing with these kinds of issues (sexual harassment)."

Dirks, who supports Darling's initiatives, improving the Corps, said the organization will continue to be successful.

"The Corps is a tremendous asset to Texas A&M and it's nationally and internationally recognized organization with a tremendous history and tremendous tradition," Dirks said. "And as the Corps is building on that tradition."

"One could almost say as the Corps goes so goes the University."

said Knauth. "We worked it out with the victims to make restitution but today everything just kind of blew up."

Knauth said he doesn't think the pledges took the items with criminal intent.

"I feel like some of the guys got carried away, but they're very sorry about it, I'm very sorry about it, and we're doing everything possible to make it right," he said.

Webster said that the Texas A&M IFC has set a Judicial Board date with the fraternity to handle disciplinary action by the University.

"Our regular course of action is to sit down with the fraternity president and decide what to do," he said.

The fraternity has 10 days to decide a case unless they decide to waive it to avoid excessive negative publicity.

The University will handle the situation according to the Judicial Board decision, but the attorney and police departments have their own agenda as a pressing criminal charge, Webster said.

Leese will meet with the pledges this week to try to determine how the theft occurred without upperclassmen knowledge.

Racism

African-American children do not relate to the many white characters that they are instructed to read, just one form of institutionalized racism in education.

"The fact that our (African-American) are bombarded with stories about children of other races asked to answer, analyze, and interpret experiences which are not their own and then failed for demonstrating a lack of understanding is in fact the ultimate act of institutionalized racism," Price said.

Price also focused on institutionalized racism in higher education and how African-Americans in predominately white institutions, such as A&M, should not become lackadaisical in their attitudes and complacent in the strides they need to make on their individual campuses.

Price said the institutions fail to live up to their names.

"Institutions across this country have historically been the incubators of racism," said Price. "I guess the sad travesty and commentary is that you are supposed to be on a campus of higher education."

Price said the white leadership of fraternities on college campuses is where the leadership of tomorrow is bred, in terms of the leadership of corporations in the United States.

He told the crowd that he should not be surprised that he had a jungle party, but instead expect actions like that in corporate America when they graduate.

"Don't you be surprised that they had a jungle party," Price said. "That is indicative of what you've got to deal with in terms of dealing with corporate America. They won't call it a jungle party, they'll just say you didn't make the grade."
