used to satisfy requirements in the college. This requirement would supply a list of about 30 to 40 classes that would fit into the curriculum, and would only be required for liberal arts majors.

"Students who have a rather narrow provincial perspective here can get away with it because they're at a predominantly white institution where everyone thinks alike," Oliver said.

Oliver said students should be prepared for a society in which, more than likely, they will end up working for and with minorities and women, and having a cultural requirement as a part of the curriculum would not only prepare students for success after college, but also for life in general.

"I think the curriculum, for a large part, can prepare them for those cultural differences," Oliver said.

"All students, not just white students, become more informed about and therefore sensitive to cultural differences," Oliver said. "They become more thoughtful more respectful; it's not a question of political correctness and being overly sensitive, it's simply recognizing that the different racial groups in this country have had histories, historical experiences that are significantly different from the white experiences."

Schmidt also believes in having a required multicultural curriculum, and believes a general multicultural course is a starting point.

"As far as the idea of what we generally consider a multicultural curriculum, that would be multiculturalism infused in every class in every subject," Schmidt said. "I think that's something that's going to come way down in the future."

Schmidt said that A&M is working through decades and decades of monoculturalism, and some of the ideas and practices will be difficult to undo.

She thinks that a positive short-term goal is sensitivity training — communicating the point that people need to be aware of differing cultural perspectives.

She feels also that individualized courses such as African-American history might not be very useful to a developing culture where human relations would be useful.

"You could take a course in African-American history, I think that's good — but it's not the answer," Schmidt said. She believes that a course on cross-cultural relations would be much more beneficial.

"Our society is evolving and our educational system needs to evolve just like our society," Schmidt said. "In order to prepare our students to be successful once they leave here, it is the University's obligation to provide them with what they need."

Schmidt, who teaches a course called "Leadership in a Multicultural Society" agrees with Oliver that the curriculum must be required.

"I think it should be a requirement," Schmidt said. "I think the University needs to decide for a student to be considered to receive a degree of higher education, multiculturalism should be part of the degree."

Schmidt said that the issue of multicultural awareness is not so much an idea of being politically correct, but rather an issue of human relations.

"This is not learning how to censor your language, it's learning how to understand differences."
