

Thompson

said the University needs to work harder to educate its students on cultural sensitivity.

"A&M should stand up and say 'We are not going to tolerate this behavior here,'" Thompson said. "A&M should make people feel good and realize our goal is to make our country and our universities great and create opportunities."

Thompson alluded to the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity at Texas Tech University in Lubbock which was accused of racist behavior at a party.

The theme was "Party in the Projects" and allegedly, one fraternity member attended the party dressed in a Ku Klux Klan uniform.

"They threw that fraternity off campus," Thompson said. "What benefits do we derive from kicking students out of school. Do we deprive them of an education or do we give them the opportunity to become aware of other cultures?"

Actually, the Tech fraternity was not kicked off campus, but it was punished by its University Discipline Committee.

The Tech fraternity's rush and social schedules have been suspended through 1994, and it may not participate in any intramural sports. Further, it must participate in several multicultural events and it must coordinate a program on human dignity for presentation to the Tech Greek system.

The fraternity appealed the sanctions to the University Appeals Committee where all the penalties were upheld.

The fraternity has since filed an appeal with State Attorney General Dan Morales, arguing the University has violated their civil rights under the first amendment. Pending the outcome of the Pi Kappa Alpha chapter's appeal, the fraternity continues to maintain an active rush schedule, social schedule and athletic schedule — the sanctions, although being imposed, are not being enforced.

Regarding the incidents at Tech, Thompson said she had not sent a letter to Texas Tech calling for the resignation of its president Dr. Robert Lawless for the actions of its fraternity or for the university's handling of them, but still insisted A&M would be better off if Mobley stepped down.

Although Thompson disagreed with Mobley's handling of the A&M incident, she agreed that the benefits of a multicultural education program sponsored by the A&M Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity far outweigh the option of kicking students out of school.

"Education should not be used as a form of punishment," Thompson said.

Thompson agrees that education is the best possible answer to sensitizing students to cultural diversity.

Mobley

scholarships awarded to high-achieving minority students. In 1988, the total number of President's Achievement Award Scholarships, $2,000 scholarships minority recipients receive once a year for four years, was 1,010.

In 1991, that number had increased to 1,275 and, at a new value of $2,500 per scholarship, the total funds spent on these minority scholarships has risen to $3.19 million dollars — an increase of $1.17 million.

A&M, along with the University of Texas, sponsors outreach centers in six Texas cities. These centers are designed to keep kids in high school, graduate them and stimulate their interest in attending college.

A&M has also achieved an 89 percent increase in minority enrollment since 1985, as well as the highest retention rate for minority students in Texas; however, Thompson said that still is not enough — a belief also held by Mobley.

"When you talk about A&M as a flagship University, that includes training the minority leaders of the future," Mobley said.

Mobley agreed that despite A&M's steps in a positive direction, much more remains to be done. "We're making great strides — it's a challenge and an opportunity and we're rising to it — but obviously it's not as much as we'd like."

Mobley said that as society continues to shift toward a global village setting, it is the responsibility of the University to educate its students regarding multicultural sensitivity, and college is the time for students to learn how to interact and work together.

Beginning in January 1993, University officials will be meeting with African-American and Hispanic groups to discuss multicultural issues, move toward solutions and work toward the future.

"We all have our own backgrounds and identities, but it's the common ground that's going to make all the difference."
