Attorney calls Border Patrol discriminatory

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

EL PASO— An attorney who represented Hispanic FBI agents in a discrimination lawsuit against the agency says the U.S. Border Patrol is ripe for a class-action suit of its own.

"The organization is permeated with discrimination," said El Paso attorney Antonio Silva. "I've spoken with about 50 minority INS people over the past four years, everyone from motor pool mechanics to senior agents. That critical mass of cases is there now."

"They're just missing a charismatic leader," Silva said discrimination permeates the agency nationwide, but any class action suit would probably stem from the border.

basically decided that we had overstepped our bounds," he said. "We don't really have that authority. He (Carabetta) had turned into a vendor that wasn't paying for space, utilities or clean-up."

"Although student groups were profiting, so was an individual."

Even if he tried to abide by the rules, it would not be worthwhile for him to continue operations, Carabetta said.

"I could see what they (University officials) were doing," he said. "Even if I could get through the regulations, they would continue to monitor me under a microscope."

Carabetta compiled a petition that was signed by over 1000 of his patrons. He sent the petition, along with a letter to Dr. William Mobley, president of Texas A&M University.

Carabetta said he has not received a response to that letter.

Oran Jones, proctor for the Blocker Building, said he thinks Carabetta's services are beneficial.

"Apparently, there's someone who doesn't want him in the building," he said. "As far as exception in the building, his service is being utilized."

John Small, a senior English major and one of Carabetta's patrons, said he is disappointed a concession stand is closing.

"I understand business, but also think there is a place in the world for personable service," said. "I find it hard to believe a little coffee shop with donuts that everyone uses, is going to ally detract from a University wide food service."

Local Coca-Cola company officials were unavailable for comment.

In addition to several speakers, he said several faculty members will moderate panel discussions with some filmmakers to encourage interaction on many issues.

occurring on the last week of Black History month."

Organizers chose the February date because the Academy Award nominations will be announced a week before, said Alvaradi-Dykstra.

"That will be a definite topic that Lee will talk about," Alvaradi-Dykstra said.

Division played for the game on Sunday, and the rest of the week.
