World Trade Center bombing investigation

A second call two days later extended the deadline to Jan. 26, which passed without incident. Kelly said such a threat was not uncommon in New York, and that authorities receive 10 to 12 a year.

In reply to a question about Hamas, Fox said: "That's a group with a known propensity for violence. That's a group we're looking at, one of several groups."

Earlier, FBI spokesman Joe Valiquette said the investigation wasn't focused on a single group. He wouldn't comment on published reports about a Serbian connection.

While investigators searched for clues and suspects, authorities took another approach in the search for the bombers: a $200,000 reward, the biggest in city history, for information leading to their arrest and conviction.

Four days after the blast, families of the victims buried their dead and officials announced plans for a "small and symbolic" memorial at the World Trade Center. One man believed lost in the explosion suddenly resurfaced.

Another remained missing. Friday's explosion also injured more than 1,000, sent tens of thousands fleeing down smoke-filled stairways, and forced the shutdown of the twin towers, the world's second-tallest buildings. The buildings may reopen later this month, authorities said.

Fox said authorities also were looking through the blown-out garage for surveillance tapes that could provide them with a license plate number or other lead toward the bombers. One of the tapes was missing, misplaced by a garage worker, he said.

Work in the rubble below the Vista Hotel focused on the vehicles battered in the explosion.
