Sluder, a political science major from Richardson. "But overall it looked like we had a lot of support."

The student regent bill, cosponsored by Rep. Sherri Greenberg and Rep. Steve Ogden, will create a non-voting student position in all 11 state university governing boards.

Sluder said Beller and other students who gave testimony all spoke in support of the bill.

"They told the committee that there needs to be a voice for students that regents can go to in a meeting," he said.

Rob Giesecke, Ogden's

spokesman, said Ogden emphasized the rising cost of being a student and told the committee if someone is asked to pay more, they should have a say about how the money is used.

"Students are the customers," Giesecke said. "The idea is that students are being asked to pay the rising cost of education and they should have a voice."

Sluder said the only opposition to the bill concerned the right that students already have to attend meetings. A few representatives felt students should already be able to accomplish the same things a student regent would.

"We brought up the fact that most students don't have enough time to prepare for a regent meeting," he said. "A student regent would be able to do that."

Another concern is that students from other schools in the A&M System have not had the opportunity to voice their concerns at the Board's meetings, Sluder said.

If approved, the new bill would allow one student from each system school to have an opportunity at the new position. The governor would make the final appointment.

No matter what school a student came from, he or she would represent all students in the system.

Sluder said the students told the committee they weren't looking for a voting position or access to closed session at this point.

"We just want to have a voice," he said. "We told them that it would be mutually beneficial."
