Refugee describes losses of war

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TUZLA, Bosnia-Herzegovina — As others fought to get on the U.N. trucks leaving besieged Srebrenica, Sabera Bosancic was screaming to stay. But foreign relief workers didn't understand her words: "Don't tear me away from my family!"

Many fellow refugees from the town on Sunday savored their first day in nearly a year in which they did not have to fear dying of starvation or Serb shelling.

But Bosancic, among the 673 hustled by U.N. personnel into trucks and driven to Tuzla Saturday, wept while thinking of the two children she had been forced to leave behind.

Bosancic, 37, said during the confused evacuation she couldn't find anyone who understood her protest.

"I was crying and screaming," the sunken-cheeked woman sobbed.

In February, a serb mortar shell shredded her now swollen and discolored left leg.

A doctor in a field hospital picked out pieces of shrapnel. There was no anesthesia, and she fainted in pain.

Bosancic said she lost word of her husband and two other children last March, a day before armed Serbs came to her village of Nova Kasaba.

They had gone to a doctor's appointment and never came back.

The village folk sought refuge in a forest, where they stayed for a month, begging for food when it appeared safe.

"Sometimes we spent a week without a piece of bread," Bosancic said. "If we found something we gave it to the children and held our stomachs in pain as we watched them wolf it down."

Once Serb infantrymen opened fire, killing about 50 people, she said.

In May, the group moved into Cerska, which fell to the Serbs three weeks ago.

As more refugees came, bombed-out houses, storage sheds and stables began to overflow.

Serb barrages increased as fall turned to winter. "Sometimes 60 to 65 people died daily, others were crippled," she said.

The mortar round that wounded her and two children on Feb. 8 killed two other women, she said. She was carried by stretcher to a field hospital in Hrnici near Konjevic Polje, also under Serb attack.

Bosancic split her daily ration of oats and water with her 17-year-old and 12-year-old daughters.

Konjevic Polje fell to the Serbs last week. Days earlier, Bosancic and scores of other wounded were moved by stretcher and horse-drawn cart to Srebrenica past corpses mutilated by shrapnel.

She stayed in the overflowing hospital there until the evacuation — without her girls.

"Those who could, fought to get on those trucks," she said, eyes red-rimmed. "Why didn't they take someone else?"

"Sometimes we spent a week without a piece of bread. If we found something we gave it to the children and held our stomachs in pain as we watched them wolf it down."

Man screams for assistance after being placed in morgue

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A man who was declared dead after a traffic accident spent two days in a metal box in a mortuary before his cries alerted workers, a newspaper said Sunday.

But Siphon William Mdletshe, 24, told the Sunday Times he is heartbroken because his fiancée has rejected him, believing he is a zombie.

Mdletshe, from the township of Sebokeng south of Johannesburg, was declared dead on March 13 after a traffic accident and taken to a mortuary.

He was placed in the metal box and remained there for the next 48 hours, drifting in and out of consciousness.

Mdletshe told the newspaper he slowly became alert enough to realize he was trapped in a box and began screaming for help.

Mortuary workers heard the commotion and freed him.

Mdletshe says his fiancée, who also was injured in the crash, refuses to believe his story and told nurses at the hospital where she is recuperating that he returned from the dead to haunt her.

Pope names two deceased women to sainthood

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II on Sunday canonized a French nun and a Chilean nun, calling the women "daughters of light."

The pope elevated Claudine Thevenet, who founded the Congregation of the Religious of Jesus and Mary, and Teresa de Jesus de Los Andes, a Carmelite novice who is Chile's first saint.

Teresa de Jesus, who was born Juana Enriqueta Josefina Fernandez Solar, was beatified by the pope during his trip to Chile in 1987.

She died of typhus in 1920, three months short of her 20th birthday and six months short of completing her canonical novitiate.

She was praised by the pope for her spirituality and devotion to God.

"This Chilean Carmelite, who with true joy I present as the model of the perennial youth of the Gospel, offers clear testimony of an existence that claims to all men and women of today that in loving, adoring and serving God is the greatness and the joy, the freedom and the ultimate realization of a human being," said John Paul.

Thevenet, who was born in 1774, was 15 when she lived through the siege of Lyon by the army and witnessed the execution of her two brothers by guillotine.

The Supreme Soviet voted 125-16 to ask Russia's Constitutional Court to review Yeltsin's declaration of emergency rule.

ment has erected obstacles to Yeltsin's free-market reforms and tried to curb his powers.

In a nationwide television address Saturday, Yeltsin declared a "special order of government" until a national vote of confidence in his leadership is held April 25.

While he stopped short of dissolving parliament, he said presidential decrees would take precedence over the decisions of the legislature and courts.

Yeltsin

More Western governments offered support for the Russian leader, echoing President Clinton's statement Saturday that Yeltsin appeared the best hope for reform.

The result of the struggle could be a chaotic period of what Russians call "dual power," in which two competing authorities claim to run the country and annul each other's decisions.

The Supreme Soviet voted 125-16 to ask Russia's Constitutional Court to review Yeltsin's declaration of emergency rule.

If the court finds Yeltsin violated the Constitution, he could be impeached by the full parliament, the Congress of People's Deputies.

The Supreme Soviet's resolution also asked Russia's chief prosecutor to consider whether any of Yeltsin's advisers bore criminal responsibility for the declaration of emergency rule.

Yeltsin did not attend the session. Government officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the president's mother had died over the weekend in the Siberian city of Yekaterinburg.

Russia has been crippled by "dual power" crises twice before: in the summer of 1917 after the czar was overthrown and during Yeltsin's power struggle with then-Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev in 1991.

The 1917 deadlock was broken by the Bolshevik Revolution and seizure of power by the Communists. The Gorbachev-Yeltsin impasse ended only with the failed hard-line coup of August 1991 and the Soviet collapse four months later.

For months, Russia's parlia-
