State funds

there's an extremely long way to go before we can congratulate ourselves," Gourrier said.

Gourrier said DEC has contacted many University officials to try to get A&M to incorporate its plan into the budget.

"The press conference was a culmination of 90 days of frustration with the administration," Gourrier said. "Over the past 90 days, we've been trying to get the administration to show us where they have incorporated our list of 10 points into A&M's legislative agenda."

"We have yet to see that A&M is putting these things into their legislative agenda," he said.

This plan includes state funding for the Race and Ethnic Studies Institute, state funding for women's studies, expanding the minority scholarship program and a statute mandating for a uniform reporting procedure for discriminatory actions.

Jeffrey Brown, a senior English and history major, said DEC chose to center their efforts at A&M's legislative budget because it would make funding permanent, instead of having it rely on the view of the administration.

"We started with the state legislature because it has some permanence," Brown said. "We don't know how long this Board of Regents or the President will be around."

Ron Going, a freshman political science major, said this issue is a legislative concern.

"We want long-term change, not year-to-year change, in order to get funding for diversity programs at Texas A&M," he said. "Going through the legislature makes everything more permanent."

He said DEC wants a nontransferable program that could not be used for anything other than improving diversity in the future.

Brown said the University needs a comprehensive program for diversity, and current programs are not adequate.

"The problem is there's not a holistic approach to this problem," Brown said. "We're sick of the University saying one thing and doing another."

Mobley's statement defied University policies, and said the President's Achievement Award Scholarship Program has increased every year since its creation in 1979, with more than $2.9 million given in 1992-93.

Gourrier said, "They're funding these programs so they can say they have them. But they're not giving them enough money to accomplish anything."

Amy Rodriguez, a sophomore Spanish and bilingual education major, said A&M is not doing nearly enough in the area of recruiting minority faculty members.

"The faculty is a good example of how A&M does something, but it's not enough," Rodriguez said. "Fifteen out of 2,000 members of the faculty are Hispanics, and 25 are black."

"That's terribly disproportionate for a university," she said.

DEC members also said the results of the lack of diversity at A&M will affect students even after they graduate.

Going said, "If A&M doesn't ease tensions between different ethnicities, they'll keep putting white people into the work force who will be shocked at the diverse population. They don't see it on this campus."

Gourrier said this aspect makes it much more than a minority issue.

"Whites will be at a disadvantage in the work force because they are taught at A&M that everything is run by white males," he said. "That's just not how the work force is."

"Texas A&M can no longer afford to ignore these issues," Gourrier said.

"The press conference was a culmination of 90 days of frustration with the administration."

-Joseph Gourrier
A&M NAACP president

But Rep. Steve Ogden, R-Bryan, said A&M is not ignoring these issues.

"I think A&M is making a serious effort at minority recruitment and retention," Ogden said. "Right now, 15 percent of the tuition students pay goes into a fund to assist economically disadvantaged students."

"This is an example of how the state of Texas is putting its money where its mouth is," he said.

Ogden said he has already been addressing diversity issues at A&M in the Legislature.

"I put a rider on an appropriations bill to collect information on minority recruitment and retention programs in the state to determine if they are adequate and efficient," he said.

Gourrier said everyone is saying A&M needs to improve diversity, but programs to achieve it are not adequate.

We want simple improvements that everyone is already saying we need," Gourrier said. "Mobley has said it, everyone has said it. We need to do something about this."

He also said the argument that A&M can't do this because of budget constraints is not true.

"We're confident this can be done with less than 2 percent of Texas A&M's budget," Gourrier said. "Wilson has said A&M has the money to do these things. It's just a matter of reallocating funds from other areas."

Brown said, "A&M is a great place, but it could be so much better. We have a long way to go in the area of diversity."
