itude that any advantage is a good one. Conducting two to three weeks of these drills is a definite advantage if other teams do not. Consequently, there is pressure for many coaches to keep up with the competition and follow suit.

Whether A&M coach R.C. Slocum is feeling any of this pressure is unknown. If he is, one can hardly blame him in this day and age.

With any other player, save running backs Greg Hill and Rodney Thomas, the impact of an injury in the spring would not be so great. But take a look at the Aggies' quarterbacking situation. Pullig was a revelation last season as a true freshman, and with a full spring under his belt would be almost a lead-pipe cinch for the All-Southwest Conference first team this year. Behind Pullig there is only Tommy Preston, a talented athlete, but one without adequate game experience. Jeff Granger and Matt Miller are in the middle of baseball season, Kent Petty's eligibility is used up, and Steve Emerson was moved back to quarterback after a stint at linebacker last fall. And in case you've forgotten, A&M recruited no quarterbacks this year. None.

If Pullig's injury had been more serious, there probably would have been no death knell sounded. Miller was well on his way to the starting job before the return of Granger and the emergence of Pullig. And anyone who saw Preston play at A&M Consolidated High School knows his immense throwing and scrambling ability. Depth, however, would have been at a premium at the position. That would have put a serious dent in the Aggies' chances of another undefeated regular season, as well as a third consecutive Cotton Bowl berth.

Perhaps the NCAA should eliminate contact drills in the spring, or at least put stricter limits on them. Considering the unlikelihood of such a display of common sense by the governing body, several of the higher-profile coaches around the country would do good to set an example by limiting the number of days their teams practice in full pads and conducting more half-speed drills. It's okay - we won't think players are wimps if they don't go full speed at a time when they're at their worst shape.

We sure won't think so if a healthy Pullig is throwing touchdown passes in Dallas on New Year's Day.

think this weekend you could see a lot of people going the other way with (the ball), and we had a lot of opposite field home runs," Fedora said.

"When we get ahead we can still put guys in and they play just as well as the starters do."

After his performance Friday, Granger has notched 77 strikeouts in 65 innings this year, second in single-season A&M history to his own record of 97 he set last season. To break this record, Granger has about a third of a season left to notch 21 more K's, a total he reached in one game Friday.

Granger's career strikeout total now stands at 328, an A&M career record he claimed earlier in the season when he surpassed Mark Thurmond's previous mark of 273.

The SWC's full season strikeout record was set by Texas' Greg Swindell at 501 in 1985, the same year Swindell pitched a SWC record 172 innings en route to a SWC record 19-win season.

Tech 'Swoopes' to national championship

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA - A championship game record for Sheryl Swoopes, a championship for her team. Texas Tech's wondrous season is complete.

Swoopes showed why she was the national player of the year, scoring 47 points to cap a record-breaking run through the NCAA tournament and lead Texas Tech to its first women's title with an 84-82 victory Sunday over Ohio State.

It was the most points in an NCAA championship game by a man or woman and the second most in any NCAA game by a woman. The 6-foot senior also set a championship game record for points in one half (24) and tournament marks for total points (177 in five games) and free throws (57).

"There are no words to explain how great a player Sheryl Swoopes is," Texas Tech coach Marsha Sharp said. "We're pleased she was able to show the nation as a whole the great things she was capable of doing."

Swoopes, voted the Final Four's outstanding player, carried Tech to the title in its first Final Four appearance. The Lady Raiders finished with 19 straight victories and a 31-3 record and broke a 14-game winning streak for Ohio State (28-4).
