

J-Board orders special runoff for RHA seat

By GINA HOWARD

Texas A&M University Student Government will hold a special runoff election Tuesday to fill the position of Residence Hall Association (RHA) vice president of student development.

The Judicial Board ruled Thursday that a runoff was necessary between candidates Janel Schroeder and Tim McGinty because of a vague election rule.

The wording of a section in election rules and regulations states, "the winners shall be decided by a majority vote (fifty percent or more of the vote)."

Schroeder, a freshman business administration major, received 13 of the 26 votes cast, and McGinty, a junior economics major, received four.

Originally, the Election Commission ruled Schroeder the winner, but McGinty appealed the decision to the Judicial Board which decided 50 percent did not constitute a majority and called for the runoff.

The special election will be held from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. at the Commons and Sbsia Dining Centers.

commissioner, said election problems stem from vague rules and regulations.

"The rules and regulations need to be revised," Cook said. "Hopefully in the future they will be more specific and we won't have problems like this one."

During the hearing, the board heard debate from Election Commissioners and Mark Rollins, a senior yell leader and spokesman for the cadets.

Rollins said it was ridiculous to think cadets would vote only for candidates on the memorandum.

"This is taking the Corps of Cadets as blind followers," Rollins said. "We are being persecuted for being organized. Just because we are an organization does not mean we are all followers."

Haraway, who spoke as a witness, agreed with Rollins.

"You can't assume just because I publish a memo means the cadets will only vote for those candidates," he said. "I didn't say 'Here's a list of all CTs, go vote for them.' My intent was not malicious."

Michelle Campbell, election co-commissioner, said that was not in question.

"The issue isn't how they voted," she said. "It's because it was campaign material and the Election Commission has the sole authority to define campaigning."

Brian Walker, student body president-elect, said the Judicial Board can only decide whether the memo was legally right, not if it was morally right.

"I couldn't fine a cadet candidate for something Haraway did," Walker said. "We have to look at how the Corps of Cadets is structured. A fish has no control over what Haraway does even if he asks."

Campbell said she stands behind the board's decision.

"We (Election Commission) did what we felt was right at the time, but we support the Judicial Board's decision," Campbell said. "That's what the (appeal) process is for."

Station, said going into the rival bar to box was difficult.

"At first I was apprehensive about it, but we got in here and forgot we were in a bar. It was just like a boxing gym, and I didn't even think about it."

Rubio, whose face was swollen from three days of boxing, said it was difficult appreciating the experience.

"Actually I don't know what the hell I do it for - it's kind of masochistic," he said. "It's just one of those things - you put yourself through hell and see how much you can accomplish. It's more of a relief - a relaxing feeling."

Jeremy Kerth, a member of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity which shared the Fight Night Greek championship with the Pikes, said he did not have any fighting experience until he started training two months ago in the U.S.A. Boxing Gym in Bryan.

Kerth, who took the trophy for the outstanding match, said he trained on a punching bag, ran and jumped rope, but said that sparring with other boxers helped him the most.

"You've got to feel what it's like to be hit, because that takes a lot out of you," he said. "You've got to work out with somebody else because when you're hitting the bag you don't get that feel."

In the open divisions, Lee Bridgeman won the welterweight title, David Guzik won the light middleweight, Lance Wadley grabbed the middleweight, Cody Stanaland took the light heavyweight, and Barry McFadden won the heavyweight.

For the rest of the Greek divisions, Brian Hardin won the light middleweight title, Bill Yarnell won the middleweight, and Heath Barnes took the heavyweight.

The event benefited a scholarship in the name of Michael J. Tyler, a former student at A&M.

The amount raised was unavailable at the time of publication.

"I learned how to become the perfect 'Uncle Tom,'" she said. "I did everything I was supposed to do, I never talked back to anybody, I got off the sidewalk whenever a professor walked by. I knew that was the only way I was going to survive."

Unterberger wrote a prize-winning dissertation in two years while teaching five classes and raising a family. She said she was offered her first job not because of her strong professional credentials, but because her background was varied which enabled her to teach a mixture of courses.

Unterberger expanded her dissertation into a book, which was reviewed by the former Soviet Union's state-run newspaper, Pravda. The newspaper labeled her a "bourgeois revisionist and a lackey of capitalism," which she said actually helped her career and opened doors for her.

Unterberger said she hopes the amount of service universities demand from women won't go unrecognized.

Being the only woman in seminars and on committees, Unterberger said she often felt "outside the loop" and had to ask students and professors to refer to her by her title. She was later thankful for the experience because it afforded her an opportunity for introspection and self-discovery, she said.

Unterberger, who began teaching at A&M in 1968, has taught all over the world and credits both hard work and good fortune for her achievements. She said her research opened doors and allowed her to speak authoritatively on a number of subjects.

Women today have many more opportunities, Unterberger said. She feels one of her most important roles is as a mentor for students by helping them in situations with which she's had experience.

About equality Unterberger said, "I used to pray at night, 'How come You gave me a mind, if I'm not supposed to use my head?'"

Because the community is everyone's business ...

Almost everyone agrees that economic development is crucial to the strength of our community.

David Hickson knows the importance of attracting new business and promoting the expansion of existing ones. By reviewing the existing vision for growth, Hickson believes the city can develop a solid foundation for the future and improve on the high quality of life associated with College Station.
