to believe that nothing is wrong with the child and find a way to help the child achieve excellence," she said.

One thing that schools can do to help is to install a short, simple auditory discrimination program for young children, Montecel said.

"The program will probably only take about six weeks, but you and the children will definitely know the difference," she said.

Montecel also spoke about two efforts of her organization that have given new insight into school success for all children under the new approach.

The first was a longitudinal study of a Texas school district over two and a half years that found, through interviews with children in school and those who had dropped out, that the school, the family and the community must help a student do well and remain in school.

"For the young people who remained in school, there was always one part of the triad that worked for each student," she said. "If the school wasn't providing the needed support, the student could rely on the family or someone in the community to provide reassurance."

Another IDRA effort was development of the Coca-Cola Valued Youth Program over the past eight years.

The Valued Youth program has been validated through the U.S. Department of Education's National Diffusion Network, and has been recognized for academic excellence by the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Bilingual Education.

The program, which provides elementary school children with middle and high school student tutors, proceeds from the belief that all children are important, Montecel said.

The program tutors "at risk" students, those who make poor grades and have poor disciplinary records, she said.

"We act on the idea that these students are important, and they can contribute something from themselves," she said. "And as a result of participating, these students are staying in school, becoming more attached to their teachers, and becoming more a part of the school. The results are amazing."

The successful programs stem from three ideas that are fundamental to any effort that works, Montecel said.

The effort must first value children, she said. Secondly, it must provide support to children in ways that traditional school programs do not.

"Programs that work concern themselves with making sure that children are fed, not ill, and that they are caring for the entire person, including the mind," Montecel said.

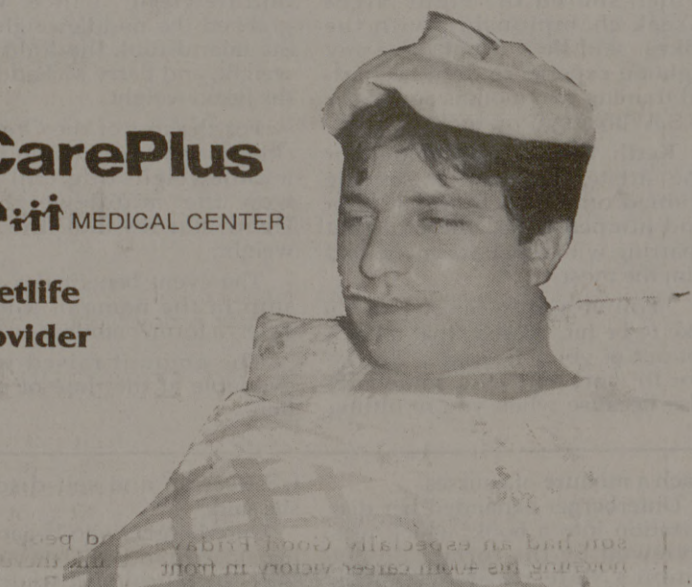

Third, parents and communities must be meaningfully involved in the effort, and must be given positions of leadership and responsibility, she said.

"Based on our experience and research, these are the three characteristics that I feel must be included in any effort that is going to appropriately support children, especially minority children, in school success," she said. "We have to listen to the children and learn what they need most."

QUANTUM COW TUTORING

The Quantum Cow would like to thank the student who contributed the following poem for $1.00 off:

While sitting in a field one day
I saw a cow pass my way.
And slipping on a glass of wine
I sat and admired that cute bovine.
She was a guernsey, big and strong;
I watched her, and before too long
My heart it knew not what to do!
I swooned as she began to moo.
But nature played a joke on me;
It simply was not meant to be.
For there was one whom she held dear,
And I could not compare to that great steer.
So I sat back and drank my wine,
And bid farewell to that fair bovine.....
