for Student Services, said choosing whether to follow a tradition is up to the student.

"I disagree with people fussing and complaining about people not following traditions," Koldus said. "It's tradition. It's not a law."

"People can do what they want to do," Koldus said.

Jim Reynolds, director of the MSC, said the MSC has attempted to represent minorities better.

"Among Aggies that received the Congressional Medal of Honor, there were no minorities," he said. "So a student suggested an art exhibit identifying all of the Congressional Medal of Honor winners."

Reynolds said the MSC has not been able to obtain this exhibit, but will continue to try to represent minorities at the MSC.

"In the meantime, we will be looking for other exhibits," he said. "We are always searching for exhibits to represent minorities."

Efforts to represent minorities at the MSC are valuable, but Koldus said other alternatives should be pursued.

"I personally feel we should educate people on traditions and attempt to explain why we have them," Koldus said.

Carreathers said the University's effort to increase diversity should focus on the entire University instead of one object to commemorate minorities.

"When we talk about being a diverse campus, this should permeate throughout the entire campus," Carreathers said.

died in wars may help," but if you want to take off your hat at the MSC, it's your business."

Carreathers said traditions mean different things to different people.

"Minorities may see a tradition differently than white students," he said. "Black males wear hats all the time now."

"When we decided to accept a diverse group of students into this University, we had to accept their attitudes and personalities as well," Carreathers said.

Because the community is everyone's business . . .

Almost everyone agrees that economic development is crucial to the strength of our community.

David Hickson knows the importance of attracting new business and promoting the expansion of existing ones. By reviewing the existing vision for growth, Hickson believes the city can develop a solid foundation for the future and improve on the high quality of life associated with College Station.

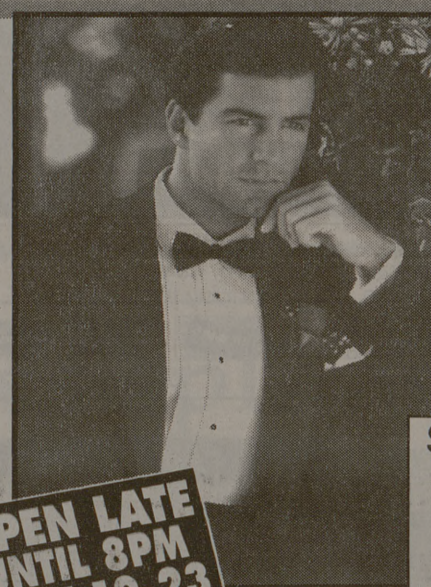

And so is the future.
