Cast fails to save clichéd 'Proposal'

By JOE LEIH

The Battalion

"Indecent Proposal" Starring Robert Redford, Demi Moore, Woody Harrelson and Oliver Platt Directed by Adrian Lyne Rated R Playing at Cinema III

Even with the talent of Robert Redford, Demi Moore and Woody Harrelson (well... maybe not Wood), the new film "Indecent Proposal" fades from an exploration of today's moral standards to the melodrama of a simple love story cliché.

The stage for the moral conflict is set rather well. David Murphy (Harrelson) and his gorgeous wife Diana (Moore) are both young, innocent, and truly believe they will always be in love. The couple fall upon financial troubles and try to overcome their debts by gambling. Failing miserably at the attempt, the two lovers encounter suave billionaire John Gage (Redford), who thinks nothing of losing thousands of dollars a wager. The wealthy Gage takes an interest in Diana and offers David a million dollars for one night of passion with her. In Gage's words: "A lifetime of security, for one night." From the point of the proposal, the plot, along with the Murphys' relationship, decays miserably. Gage, a smooth, calculating manipulator of humans and money, completely reverses his character and tenderly confesses his love to

Moore

Diana. Of course, Diana, who resists: Gage the entire film, immediately melts and becomes his lover. The viewers are left confused and disappointed. The film continues to spiral down, even while the Murphys' lawyer (Oliver Platt) offers some well-deserved comic relief with his sleazy legal strategies. Still, these few funny spots aren't enough to save what could have been a great and introspective film.
