Perversion seminar focuses on sexual roles

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON - A two-week symposium on sexual taboos is not the usual academic fare sponsored by Rice University.

But some academics say the time for gender studies has come, and a peek at sexual roles and practices is needed.

"A Symposium on Perversions," Rice's cross-cultural look at abnormal gender behavior and taboo sexual practices was winding up Monday night with panels discussing everything from the Texas sodomy law to transvestites and transexuals.

Critics say such events are examples of political correctness gone amuck.

But organizers say the symposium subject reflects a changing society, one that made a movie like "The Crying Game," an overnight sensation.

"It's important for people to understand their assumptions rather than simply take them for granted," said Colleen Lamos, a Rice assistant professor of English and creator of the symposium. "I want to show the cultural relativity and plurality of what's been called perversion throughout history."

Among some of the topics discussed were Andy Warhol's sexuality and the dominant-submissive roles in lesbian relationships.

Rice isn't the first Houston-area school to focus on gender roles. The University of Houston, for instance, this year became Texas' first school to offer a class on gays: discrimination law and sexual orientation.

Chemical plant defumes repugnant odors

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BORGER - Noses that catch a whiff from Phillips Petroleum Co.'s chemical plant these days aren't suffering too badly.

Thanks to a new loading system, fugitive fumes are being deodorized in a high-tech bath that scrubs the air particles before shooting them outside.

The $2 million "mercaptan dock odor control scrubber system" reduces by 97.5 percent the foul-smelling compounds that used to escape, said Phillips process engineer Todd Vollick.

"It's a big improvement to our workers and our community," said Pete Stynes, operations manager at the Philtext Plant of Phillips' Borger complex. "We did this just because we want to reduce the odors. We're not required by law."

Philtext workers make and load mercaptans which are synthesized versions of natural stinks like garlic, onion and skunk spray. Philtext ships the mercaptans to companies around the world that inject the products as a safety measure into natural gas which has no odor.

Philtext's old loading method allowed some stinky fumes to escape around the nozzles that fit into conventional 5
