The high seas

A&M sailing assumes geographically challenged role at national competition

By ROY L. CLAY

The Battalion

Landlocked Texas A&M is being represented on the high seas this week by the University's sailing team at the National Intercollegiate Sailing Championships on the waters around St. Mary's, Md.

The final day of the two-day regatta competition is today. Seniors Dean Pledger and Simon Elliot are leading the A&M sailors in the dinghy class category.

Both Pledger and Elliot were named to the all-Southeastern Intercollegiate Sailing Association team after the Aggies became the only team in the district to qualify for the chance to compete at the national races.

The regatta consists of eight races over the course of two days of sailing. After the first day of competition, the Aggie sailors were in 12th place.

Although he nationally-ranked Aggies attended the National Championships last year as a top 20 team, this season is the best A&M has ever had.

The eight sailors representing the University are in a unique situation because of the geographic location of the school.

"It is hard to compete on the open seas when you have to train on a lake," said Paula Opal, assistant director in-charge of sports clubs.

The sailors must compete with teams from schools located on or near the coast such as Old Dominion in Norfolk, Va.

Other students representing A&M at the National Intercollegiate Sailing Championships are Sally Andrews, Christina Laughlin, Jason Morse, Deanna Piper, Andra Wilson and Larry Wise.

After the regatta competition is completed, the next stage will be team racing which features a male and female sailing team in each boat. This area of competition begins on Thursday.

NBA playoff update

PHOENIX (AP) — In the best playoff game of his career, Barkley played like the MVP he is — producing 43 points, 15 rebounds and 10 assists. Majerle took to the air, hitting 8 of 10 shots from 3-point range (an NBA playoff record) for 34 points. Score: 120-114 Series: Suns 3-2
