Vote threatened by super collider audit

SSC misspent $216 million, report says

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Super collider managers have allowed at least $216 million in unreasonable subcontractor expenses, the Energy Department's inspector general said in a draft report made public just two days before a crucial House vote.

The draft, released Tuesday by the Project on Government Oversight, also took issue with $764,000 spent by the collider's overseers — including $122,000 for employee morale, $56,000 for tropical plants and $35,000 for a Christmas party.

Edward J. Siskin, general manager of the collider, denounced the findings and denied any subcontractor overruns. "There really is no validity to that issue," he said.

Release of the internal report by the Project on Government Oversight, a non-partisan investigative group that works with government whistle-blowers, comes at a critical time for the giant atom smasher.

When the House takes up debate Thursday on the collider, now estimated at $10 billion or more to build, critics will mount their annual fight to kill it. With lawmakers anxious to prove their willingness to cut federal spending, the super collider is in peril.

The DOE document, which comes on the heels of critical reports by the General Accounting Office, could strengthen the hand of critics who have long contended that the super collider is being poorly managed and is over budget.

"Unless costs are brought under control, there will remain a risk that the SSC could substantially exceed its cost estimate and lose public support," the inspector general said in the draft being circulated within DOE for comment.

The report singled out one major subcontractor, Westinghouse Corp., which charged taxpayers $66,000 for expenses such as country club dues, golf green fees, first-class airfare and alcoholic beverages. The charges were later disallowed during an internal review. "That's something we ought to get a gold star for," said collider laboratory spokesman Russ Wylie.

Asked about the IG's report, White House budget director Leon Panetta said it bolsters the administration's decision to stretch out collider funding by three years and further monitor spending.

"I can't answer for the waste that took place in the last administration, but we do have to answer for any waste that takes place in this administration," said Panetta, who earlier this year recommended killing the collider. "And I can tell you one of my goals will be to very closely oversee spending in that area."

Siskin, who had not seen the report, said project managers have tightened spending controls. He blamed the critical report on a DOE policy debate over fixed-price contracts versus reimbursable contracts.

Reimbursable contracts have been the norm so far, with collider managers granting a contract for one component of the work and later coming back and expanding the contract to include additional work. In the case of fixed-price contracts, all of the work and the cost of the contract is assigned up front.

Tenure

Within three months after finding out they were not granted tenure, Stock and Hursey both found higher paying jobs.

As of July 18, Stock will be an assistant professor at the Pacific Graduate School of Psychology in Palo Alto, Calif.

"The school that hired me did so because of my knowledge in gender issues, and they said that my publication record was just fine," Stock said. "I am also being paid $14,000 more a year."

"I believe the University is shooting itself in the foot for letting so many qualified people leave."

A petition on Stock's behalf with more than 100 signatures and over 30 letters was signed by undergraduates, graduate students and faculty members.

"I believe that the students need to be more public with their views," she said. "If they are against something, they should let it be known."

Stock came to A&M in 1984 as a professor of psychology. She is founder and faculty advisor of the University chapter of the National Organization of Women (NOW). In 1992 she was named Feminist Activist of the Year in Texas.

An associate member of the International Academy of Sex Research, Stock was interviewed last semester on the ABC-TV program "20/20" for her pornography research. She also has been involved in community programs such as Phoebe's Home and the Rape Crisis Center for the Brazos Valley.
