Iraq threatens violation of U.N. decision

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The speaker of Iraq's parliament said Tuesday that Baghdad may stop cooperating with the United Nations on weapons destruction unless a dispute over monitoring missile sites is resolved soon.

If the Iraqi government acts on that threat, it would be blatantly violating Gulf War cease-fire accords requiring elimination of Iraq's nonconventional weapons.

A team of U.N. inspectors pulled out of Iraq on Monday to protest Baghdad's refusal to permit installation of surveillance cameras at two missile-testing sites. The departure of the U.N. team has increased fears in Baghdad that the Gulf War allies might launch a attack to force Iraq to comply.

Speaking to The Associated Press on the eve of an emergency meeting of the National Assembly, Speaker Saadi Mehdi Saleh said: "It is not in our interest, or in the interest of the United National Speaker Saadi Mehdi Saleh said: "It is not in our interest, or in the interest of the United National Speaker Saadi Mehdi Saleh said: "It is not in our interest, or in the interest of the United National Speaker Saadi Mehdi Saleh said: "It is not in our interest, or in the interest of the United National Saleh tions, or in the interest of the region to make the matter reach the stage of clashes."

"But if dialogue goes on in vain, we have to take another stand," Saleh said through an interpreter. "Dealing will be difficult between us and the United Nations because there will be a feeling inside us of cruel U.N. injustice.

After the Gulf War coalition drove Iraq from Kuwait in 1991, the U.N. Security Council ordered the destruction of Saddam Hussein's ballistic missiles, chemical and biological arsenals and nuclear weapons program.

New health books cover homosexuality

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN — It's time for high school health books to "come out of the closet" and deal with homosexuality, an activist for gay and lesbian youth told a state committee considering textbooks Tuesday. We need to see that we are not alone, that we are not monsters as the religious right paints us," said Jonathan M. Bell of Out Youth Austin. He said he represents such "sexual minority youth" as gays, lesbians, bisexuals and those who are uncertain about their sexuality.

Some contended that the way textbooks treat homosexuality could affect hate crimes and teen-age suicide, saying one study shows a higher suicide rate among homosexual

Bell praised two books that are up for state adoption as handling the subject of homosexuality with sensitivity and compassion. But he said some others ignore it or only mention it as

Some others who testified, however, said that portraving homosexuality as normal promotes it or is part of an effort to improperly set

For example, Austin parent Michael Cochran said, one book up for state adoption defines "homophobia" as "an irrational fear of homosexuals," which he said would lead students to believe that those who oppose homosexuality border on being mentally ill.

"The choice of words, teaming 'irrational' and 'fear,' make the normal people appear abnormal and the abnormal people appear normal," said Peggy Bower of the Eagle Forum of

They testified before a committee that will recommend health textbooks to the State Board of Education. Committees on various subject areas will begin voting on their recom-mendations in August, and the board will act in November.

The health books from six publishers are among $140 million worth of textbooks that are to be considered for state-funded use in Texas classrooms beginning in the 1994-95 school year. School districts can use textbooks that aren't on the state list, but they must pay for them out of local funds unless they get a

Robert Patterson, a paralegal for the attorney general's office, said, "If they think some of the information we said is open is in fact an educational record, they can request us to review it again," Patterson said. "Anything they don't have a question about they should release it."

And, Patterson said, if A&M thinks the attorney general's opinion is wrong, the University can take them to court.

Patterson said normally a case doesn't get that far, and once it does, the courts vary on who they side with.

When the female cadet first reported these incidents Dec. 15 to the University Police Department, she said she was raped by the suspect in April 1992. She also said that when she had gone to the suspect's room around Nov. 12 to pick up some papers for a class. He then tried to kiss her, and she fled the room. The female cadet did not report either incident at that time.

The female cadet said she finally reported the incident because she had reason to believe the suspect was considering the same type of harassment toward a female freshman cadet, according to the UPD incident report.

These allegations of sexual harassment and sexual assault were first reported in The Battalion on Jan. 26. The University announced the next day that a formal administrative hearing would be held to investigate these allegations.

Bob Wiatt, director of the UPD, said the female cadet in this case specifically asked that no criminal charges be filed against the male cadet.

"She wanted it to be an administrative case to be handled by the Commandant (of the Corps)," he said.

During the investigation, the suspect was suspended from his leadership position in the Aggie Band.

But Corps Commander Matthew Michaels attended the hearing and said in a Jan. 29 article in The Battalion that the male cadet was suspended because the two cadets "fraternized," and there are "strict rules against fraternization in the military.

Without the results of the investigation, it is not known if the female cadet also was penalized for the "fraternization" or if further disciplinary action was taken against the male cadet. Because the female cadet filed no formal criminal charges, records of the hearing and investigation are not available. The Dallas Morning News has also had encountered trouble getting Texas A&M to release documents at the request of the attorney general, according to an article in FOI Focus, a Freedom of Information journal.

The News filed suit April 16 against A&M in Travis County district court "to gain access to supporting documents given the NCAA with the school's report on allegations that Aggie football players received improper payments from a Dallas booster," according to the article.

After an attorney general's opinion stated the information The News requested was public, Texas A&M still refused to release the information.

After the suit was filed, the newspaper expanded their suit to ask for a permanent court order barring a "pattern of consistent and repetitive abuses of the law' by A&M.

James Bond, deputy chancellor and general counsel for A&M, said he although it sometimes appears A&M delays the release of public information, this is only a result of the process of filing an open records request.

"The attorney general's office is often slow," Bond said. "We try to avoid untimely or unfair release when there are valid exceptions to the open records act." Bond said precautions are taken to avoid the possibility of law-suits against the University.

"The University makes the final decision and we give them the best legal advice we can give them," Bond said. "We're charged with the duty of protecting these students.
