U.N. sends envoy to Iraq for talks
 Security Council persistent in monitoring missile testing

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council gave Iraq more time to reconsider its refusal to allow monitoring of missile testing, saying Monday it will send a top envoy to Baghdad for talks.

But Security Council diplomats said that if Iraq persists in its defiance, the United Nations may have to destroy the two rocket test sites where video monitors have been barred.

The Security Council last month warned Iraq of "serious consequences" if it did not cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors, yet Iraq has refused to allow the monitors at two testing sites.

The standoff worsened Sunday when Iraq rejected a U.N. proposal to seal equipment at the testing sites until the issue was resolved. U.N. inspectors there to seal the equipment abruptly left Iraq on Sunday.

The move to dispatch Rolf Ekeus, chief of the Special Commission on Iraq weapons inspections, appeared to forestall punitive U.S. air strikes for now. He was expected to arrive in the Iraqi capital Thursday.

President Clinton, on vacation in Hawaii, said Monday about the issue: "I think I'll let them (the United Nations) work on that a couple of days. I may have something to say about that later. They've got a strategy. I want to let them do their work for a couple of days before I say anything."

David Hannay, the Security Council president and British ambassador, said weapons inspectors "would have to consider destruction" of the two sites if Iraq rejects other solutions, like placement of monitoring cameras.

"The Iraqi government is playing with fire, and I hope they will stop playing with fire," Hannay told reporters after the 15-member council authorized Ekeus' visit.

Sending Ekeus was seen as a last chance for Iraq, not as a U.N. concession.
