budget year, which ends on Sept. 30. And he said that amount would probably need to be expanded as well.

He pledged to push Congress to approve whatever amount was necessary and suggested the administration may put forward a proposal for extra assistance in the next five days.

The largest chunk of the $2.48 billion package, some $945 million, would go to disaster relief administered by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. An additional $145 million would be earmarked for road and bridge repairs, and rebuilding of damaged dams and other flood control works.

After a helicopter tour in which Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad pointed out flooded fields, damaged railroad bridges and the city's contaminated water works, Clinton visited with Des Moines residents at a water distribution center and then took calls on Des Moines radio station WHO.

"I talked to people who had lost everything, their farms and businesses. It was a very moving thing," Clinton recounted to callers.

He used the radio program to stress that people who need help should contact their local office of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, where he said they would receive "one-stop shopping" to help work them through the maze of federal relief efforts.

"We are going to have a coordinated, effective and compassionate effort," Clinton pledged, stressing repeatedly that FEMA had changed for the better since receiving harsh criticism last year for the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Andrew.

Miller said none of the puppies used for testing are actually induced with the disorder. They are born with it and are treated after being brought in for their first shots he said.

In the future, doctors may also find a way to use the device in the brain or other organs to block aneurysms or to block the flow of blood to tumors during cancer therapy, said Dr. Ronald Grifka, Texas Children's Hospital pediatric cardiologist in a statement.

The study was made possible through a joint Texas A&M-Texas Heart Institute fellowship program in the Texas Medical Center.
